When the United States come to specie payments, one of two things must happen: the greenbacks must be redeemed in coin and retired, or if redeemed in coin and again put into circulation, the Government must be continually prepared to redeem them again when presented. When that time comes the banks will also be required to redeem their notes in coin, and for this purpose must keep on hand large coin reserves. Then, we will suppose that the gold-room has been abolished, for the reason that speculation in gold has ceased. Parties, therefore, who have to send gold abroad in payment of their debts, or of State or corporation bonds, or who need it to pay duties, will no longer go to the gold-room to buy it, but will procure it by presenting at the Treasury of the United States, or at the counters of the banks, greenbacks or national-bank notes for redemption, and will thus make a continual demand upon the Treasury and the banks for coin. When that time comes the assorting of bank-notes, and their return for redemption in coin, will become an established business.

Under the old State-bank system a bank was not held to be safe or well conducted that had not in its vaults one dollar in gold for three dollars of its notes in circulation. The notes of the national banks, being secured by United States bonds, a smaller gold reserve would undoubtedly answer, were it not that the banks would be continually drawn upon for coin for the importers and the payment of debts abroad. The annual drain upon the country for gold to pay foreign balances and interest will come home directly to the banks and the Treasury; and, leaving out of view how they are first to get enough to resume, the question I submit is, how are they to meet this continual drain abroad? The annual average export of specie and bullion from this country, deducting imports, for the ten years ending on the 30th of June last, was $61,935,212.40, and for the last year of the period the export was $73,905,546, this much, besides large amounts of which the Government had no knowledge or means of knowledge.

Notwithstanding the healthy financial condition of England, they have had disastrous panics in that country every ten years, on an average, since 1795, creating sudden demands for gold, disordering and threatening the stability of every financial system in Europe based upon gold. If we were at specie payments to-day, a financial panic in England to-morrow would inevitably lead to the suspension of every bank in the United States. I repeat, that the difficulty is not in our system, but in our situation. Has any country ever maintained specie payments under such circumstances?

OLD VS. NEW COUNTRIES.

The man who believes that because Germany, an old country, densely crowded with population, where every acre of land is cultivated, thickly planted with manufactories, with a superabundance of labor, with a low standard of wages, where from emigration population scarcely increases, where railroads and every form of public improvements are almost completed, and where the country is, in nearly every sense, finished, can maintain specie payments, that the United States can do the same thing, clearly does not understand our country. Here is a country in its youth, but partially settled, with a population of forty millions but capable of five hundred, with no surplus capital to invest in the bonds of other countries, with its public works unfinished, with its towns and cities not half built, rapidly growing in population, wealth, and business, with colonies overrunning mountain, plain, and desert, with new Territories fast ripening into States. And attempt is made to bind up and fetter its expanding energies and prospects with Old World theories and methods. As well attempt to put baby-clothes upon the statue of Hercules. Such men judge our country by the Old World standards. Sitting upon the steps of our national Capitol, they look up the stream of time, study the inscriptions upon the Pyramids, and the financial theories of China, and call it learning.

When paper money was first invented, the solemn philosophers of that age declared it to be an innovation not to be endured; that gold and silver had been the only money of the world, the medium of exchange for more than four thousand years; that as such they had the sanction of time and the universal experience of mankind; that the idea of substituting for them stamped paper was contrary to the established principles of political economy. But public and private convenience, political necessities, and common sense gradually prevailed against prejudices inherited from ages of barbarism, until paper money in some form became the medium of exchange in the most enlightened nations. But some nations still stand out and cling to gold and silver as the only safe and respectable medium of exchange, and are dragging their way down the path of time generally far in the rear of their more enlightened, wealthy, and prosperous neighbors.

DOES DEPRECIATION ARGUE REDUNDANCY?

Upon this floor it has been repeatedly declared by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] and by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] that the measure of the depreciation of our currency is the measure of its redundancy. The substance of this proposition is that, as our currency is depreciated about 10 per cent., a reduction of 10 per cent. in the volume of it would bring the remainder to par without any provision for its redemption. This goes beyond the concession made by Mill. It is a radical departure from the theory of necessary convertibility, dispenses with redemption, and is a complete admission that paper money issued by a government, sustained by its credit and authority, and to which certain uses and capabilities have been given by law, when the amount is adjusted to the wants of the country, may be equal in value to gold. It presents contraction as the remedy for depreciation, and leaves out gold redemption and convertibility into coin.

If the volume of our currency was reduced 10 per cent. there would still be left six hundred and seventy-five millions, an amount twice greater than the gold ever in circulation here at one time. The Senators enunciating this proposition seem not to be aware that it demolishes the theory of necessary convertibility, robs gold of its necessity, and prepares the way for new systems of finance quite unknown to antiquity.

TRUE CAUSE OF DEPRECIATION.

But I dispute the proposition that the measure of the depreciation of the currency is the measure of its redundancy. The depreciation does not depend upon that cause, but chiefly upon the fact that it cannot be used in the payment of the public debt, principal or interest, or in payment of duties. In this respect the greenbacks are depreciated by law, being denied an important function in our financial system. The interest upon the public debt must be paid in coin, and, to procure that, duties upon imports are made payable in coin. If we had no public debt, or if the interest upon it was payable in currency, then the duties might be collected in greenbacks; and there can be no doubt that they would be of the full value of gold. But while importers must procure about one hundred and seventy millions of gold annually with which to pay duties, there will be a strong demand for it in the market, and gold will be at a premium.

To this demand for gold to pay duties may be added that for gold with which to pay the interest upon our State and corporation debts held abroad, and to settle the balance of trade which annually accrues against us. The depreciation of the currency is not the result, therefore, of its redundancy, or of its intrinsic defects, but of the situation by which a large demand is created for coin for a specific purpose, for which the greenback is disqualified by law and by contract. It is not our system, but it is the situation that is in the way.

SHOULD WESTERN PEOPLE HAVE BANKS?

I now come to a proposition urged in this debate with an air of triumph as an answer to the claims of the West and South for an equal participation in the benefits of the national banking system. They are gravely assured that every bank they establish with their own capital is an absolute loss, that it is to their interest to let the Eastern States have all the banks. Lest the country will not believe that any Senator could have made such an argument unless they read it, I quote it literally from the speech of the Senator from Missouri:

> Now see how this operates. For a $1,000 bond they have to buy they pay, as 5 per cent. bonds now stand, about $1,120 in currency. That sum of $1,120 is withdrawn from their home circulation and is added to that of New York. Then they take the $1,000 bond so purchased to Washington, and for that $1,000 bond they get $900 in bank currency, and the $900 they carry home. Then they lock up 15 or 25 per cent. on the $900, as the reserve prescribed by law, in their bank vaults, as they may be country or city banks. For the $1,120 carried to New York the country bank then puts out $865 and the city bank $675 to accommodate their customers with loans and discounts. These loans and discounts may indeed come back to the bank every thirty or sixty or ninety days. But does not the Senator from Indiana see, is there anybody so blind as not to see, that a much greater amount had gone East before the western or southern bank could make any loans and discounts to its customers with its national-bank circulation? Is it not clear as sunlight that for every $865 issued by a country bank, or every $675 issued by a city bank, $1,120 had gone to New York before? Is it not clear that the amount of loanable money, instead of being increased, has been diminished 30 to 40 per cent. by the operation? It is true that by the establishment of national banks here and there some greater banking facilities may be offered. They take deposits, and they make discounts; but the value of all the facilities thus offered will not make up for the diminution which the home circulation, the amount of loanable money has actually suffered in that locality by the process. Where, then, is the increased accommodation of the business public? Nowhere; but the result is just the reverse.

How stupid the people of Indiana, Ohio, and Missouri have been in the establishment of any national banks, and how grateful they must be for information which will save them from further losses in that way!

I will take the case of a bank in a western town, and consider the manner of its organization, with a capital of $112,000. The persons proposing to get it up prepare a subscription paper which they present to responsible parties. A mechanic subscribes $1,000; a merchant $2,000; a farmer $500, and so on until the amount is made up. The amounts subscribed are seldom taken from money already loaned, but generally from the several kinds of business in which the subscribers are engaged. When the bank is organized it buys $100,000 of 5 per cent. United States bonds, for which, according to the supposition, $112,000 in currency is paid. Upon the deposit of these bonds the bank receives $90,000 in currency. From this deduct 15 per cent. reserve, $13,500, and you will have $76,500 left for loanable purposes. If the bank is well conducted it will be likely to attract deposits equal to the amount of its capital stock, of which $75,000 would be subject to loan.

And now we consider the advantages to the community in which the bank is located. They have the use of $76,500 of currency drawn from sources from which few, if any, loans were made before. They have the use also of deposits made in the bank to the amount of $75,000, which, but for the bank, would be retained in the pockets of depositors, and not available for the accommodation of borrowers; thus making an average of $150,000, all told, of loanable funds. They have the use of bank checks and facilities which take the place of currency and contribute to the wants of business to a large extent; and the beneficial influence of the bank will be likely to be seen in the increased enterprise and general improvement of the town and the surrounding country. The currency issued by the bank and the deposits loaned by it are localized, and a like amount of money must return to the bank every thirty, sixty, or ninety days in payment of loans, and be there to be borrowed again by those who need it.

To show the advantage to the country, in the way of loanable funds, produced by the national banking system, I refer to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, which shows that on the 12th day of September last the capital stock of all the banks in the United States was $491,072,016, while on the same day their loans and discounts were $940,233,304; and to bring the matter a little nearer home to the Senator, the same report shows that on the 13th of October last the twenty-nine national banks in Missouri, outside of Saint Louis, had a capital stock of $2,685,000; and on the same day their loans and discounts were $4,904,931.

But, to make out his case, the Senator assumes that the $112,000 paid out in New York in the purchase of bonds will remain there permanently, notwithstanding he and all those upon his side have argued throughout this debate that money will flow wherever it is most needed, just as water runs down hill; that it makes no difference where it starts or is paid out; that if there be a greater demand for it in New York than elsewhere it will stay there, but if the demand is greater in the neighborhood from which the money was taken, a like amount will flow back there. He further forgets that, according to his own argument, if the demand in New York is greater than elsewhere, so as to keep the money there when paid out for bonds, that same demand would have drawn the $112,000 from the country neighborhood, although it had not been taken to New York to purchase bonds.

And this illustrates the difference between greenbacks paid out by the Government and currency issued through the banks. The greenbacks have no local habitation and go wherever the currents of trade take them; but currency issued through the banks in the way of loans is localized, and a like amount must return to the locality periodically in payment of the loans, and is there to be borrowed again by persons in that locality.

IF UNPROFITABLE WOULD IT PRODUCE INFLATION?

Again, the Senator seems unconscious of the fact that his argument proving that it is unprofitable for the people of the West and South to establish national banks—a thing they did not know before, but which they know now after the Senator has told them—repels the argument, made by him and others, that upon the establishment of free banking there would be such a rush into the business from every direction that the currency would be largely inflated and depreciated. According to his argument, there would certainly be no danger in allowing the people of the Western and Southern States to have as many banks as they wanted, since they have been instructed that they would be largely the losers by their establishment, a thing which one would suppose they would have found out themselves in an experience of eight years; but which, it appears, they did not.

There is another consideration which the Senator ignores entirely; that is, that if there were opportunity offered for the establishment of banks in the West and South, large amounts of eastern capital would be at once invested in that way. The local demand for national banks would make the capital invested in them more profitable than if retained in the East. This has already occurred extensively, large amounts of the capital in the existing banks in the West and South having been sent from the East, and some of it from as far East as England and Germany.

The establishment of national banks is a costly business, and requires the investment of actual capital. The profits of the banks upon the currency they receive from the Government do not exceed, according to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, 2 per cent.; the profits of national banks depend chiefly upon the local wants of the neighborhoods in which they are established, creating a demand for their currency, and confidence in their character and management securing to them deposits, which are again loaned to the people. In the absence of this local demand, national banks cannot be profitably conducted, and would unquestionably be abandoned. If banks could be established without capital, like those of John Law or the wild-cat banks of Michigan, where no security was required to be given for the redemption of their notes, then, indeed, free banking would be dangerous. But of the difference between the two systems the Senator from Missouri is at this point of his argument oblivious. In one part of his speech banks are too costly to be started in the West and South; in another part of his speech, people would rush into banking as if it cost nothing.

A RULE THAT WORKS BOTH WAYS.

The Senator from Missouri says that any increase of the currency will cause a corresponding depreciation and a rise in the premium on gold, and that the general prices of commodities will be increased in the same way; and after that states the following proposition:

> A considerable portion of some of the most important products of agriculture is exported, and the home price of the whole crop of those specific articles is regulated by the foreign market. That is a universally known and recognized fact. The prices ruling in the foreign market are, first, depressed by the free competition of the whole world; and, secondly, a specie standard prevailing there, they are not driven up by the inflation that has enhanced the prices of all other articles in this country. The farmer or the planter has, therefore, to sell these staple crops at the low prices regulated by the foreign market, while for all the necessaries he has to buy he pays the prices grown up to an exorbitant height, far beyond the premium on gold by our home inflation.

If increasing the currency increases its depreciation and the premium on gold, then the gold price which the farmer receives abroad for his products will buy an increased amount of this currency at home, to be used in the purchases which he has to make; so that he is no loser in the operation. If, by the greater depreciation of the currency and increase of the premium on gold, the prices of the commodities which the farmer has to buy are enhanced, the increased premium on gold which he receives in foreign markets for his produce exactly meets this enhancement of the prices at home, so that he comes out even.

In anticipation of this answer the Senator says that the prices of home commodities will be enhanced beyond the increase of the premium on gold. But this is a mere assumption, unsupported by fact or argument, and at war with his own premises.

The whole business of the country is upon a level with the currency, which, as compared with gold, is at a discount of 10 per cent.; and the relative prices of all commodities are adjusted to each other as perfectly as if the currency was coin instead of paper. The conversion of the currency prices of our exports into the gold prices of Europe is as easy as the conversion of the dollar into the English pound sterling. From the export you deduct the discount, and to the import you add it. The adjustment of currency to gold prices is as simple as the rules of addition and subtraction; but around it there has been thrown a fog of mystery in which a good many unhappy people have lost their way.

INCREASE OF REDEEMABLE BANK-NOTES WILL NOT CAUSE DEPRECIATION.

But I dispute the proposition that by a reasonable increase of the currency it will be depreciated. If the increase were greatly in excess, and consisted of greenbacks, it would have that effect. The Senator himself is upon record for the declaration that if the volume of the currency be just equal to the wants of the nation, it will remain at par without provision for its redemption in gold. But should the increase of currency even exceed the actual demands of the country, its value will not be depreciated as compared with gold, if it consists of national-bank notes, and there be no increase in the amount of greenbacks. By increasing the volume of national-bank notes to be redeemed in greenbacks, you increase the demand for greenbacks as reserves, and thereby increase their value. The national-bank notes will be exactly equal in value to the greenbacks into which they are convertible, for any paper currency is always equal in value to that medium of exchange into which it is convertible.

Should the volume of national-bank notes at any time become in excess of the business wants of the country, they would be returned for redemption; and should there spring up any difference between the value of national-bank notes and greenbacks, brokers and bankers would at once speculate upon that difference, and the bills would be returned for redemption until the difference disappeared. I may just here call the attention of the Senate again to the fact that the whole argument to show that any increase of the volume of the currency will depreciate its value and produce an inflation of prices depends upon an obstinate refusal to consider the question whether such increase merely keeps pace with the increase of the population and business of the country.

IS THEIR SAFETY AN OBJECTION?

To prove that any increase of the national-bank circulation will lead to its depreciation, the Senator states the following formidable and solemn objections to the character and office of the national-bank note:

> Now, sir, although they are not literally made a legal tender in the discharge of private debt, yet being received by the Government for what is due it, and being paid out by the Government for what it owes, they are practically made a legal tender for all purposes, like the greenback. They are, moreover, founded on the secure basis of Government bonds, payable, principal and interest, in gold. Their circulation is therefore not local, but national in the widest sense of the term, just like that of greenbacks. They are just as safe, and in one sense they are even more so, for they have behind them the solid foundation of a United States bond, payable in gold, and at the same time the ability to pay of the bank that issues them. It is, indeed, provided that they shall be redeemable on demand in Government legal-tender notes, but there is really, as far as I can see, no inducement for the holder of a national-bank note to convert it into a Government legal-tender, for the bank-note does just the same business, and is just as safe as the other. The breaking of the bank that issued it does not injure its value in the least.

Here the argument to prove that the national-bank notes would be depreciated by increasing the number is deduced from the fact that they have the solid foundation of a United States bond, payable principal and interest in gold, and at the same time the ability to pay of the bank that issues them, and so well secured are they that the breaking of the bank that issued them does not injure their value in the least; in addition to which they are receivable for all Government taxes except duties on imports.

The Senator has here unconsciously answered volumes of sophistry that have been uttered about our "irredeemable, depreciated, swindling, and worthless currency." He has put to shame his own comparisons between our currency and the paper money of China, of France during the revolution, the confederate money, and the continental money issued by the Congress of the Confederation.

The Senator is entitled to the distinguished honor of having made the discovery that the exceeding safety of the national-bank notes is the chief cause of their depreciation, and the best argument to prove that great danger will result to the country from any increase in their quantity.

I come now to the most remarkable part of the Senator's argument, in which he declares that he will vote for free banking, without redemption in gold, upon the following conditions: That that part of the national-bank act which provides that the national-bank notes shall be a legal tender in payment of taxes to the Government be repealed; and that the system of redemption of the bank-notes in greenbacks be made more effectual by establishing assorting-houses at the different business centers of the country.

Here the Senator declares himself in favor of free banking upon condition that the national-bank notes are made less valuable by taking from them certain properties which they now possess in the payment of taxes. He is content to have the number of these notes increased, provided they are first depreciated by law. It had generally been supposed by unlearned persons that the more valuable a currency was and the greater the functions it possessed, the safer it was for the country. According to this logic, if the national-bank notes are emasculated in the way he proposes it will avoid the danger of inflation; which, put in another form, amounts to this: that bank-notes may be safely issued if they are first depreciated by law, made incapable of performing the most valuable offices of currency, and rendered so nearly worthless that people will not take them, or, if they do, will hasten to have them converted into greenbacks.

INTEREST.

Interest is the measure of value for the use of money for a given period. Other things being equal, the rate of interest depends upon the abundance or scarcity of money in a given State or country, to be used in the way of loans. The rate of interest, like the prices of commodities, is determined by the law of supply and demand. Where money is plenty, and there is small demand for it, the rates of interest are always low; where the supply is about equal to the demand, the rates of interest are medium; where the demand is greater than the supply, the rates of interest are correspondingly high. When the currency is contracted, the rates of interest are increased until such time as the business of the country has been so far destroyed as to destroy the demand for money, and then the rates may fall, and money seem to be plenty, from the absence of demand; which is very much the case now. By increasing the currency so as to make it just keep pace with the increase of population and business, the rate of interest will be undisturbed; but if it be so increased as to make money plentier when compared to the business than it was before, the rate of interest must be decreased.

CONCLUSION.

In conclusion, the great attraction which the United States have presented to the people of the Old World for nearly one hundred years has been wherein they differed from it, and not wherein they resembled it. The great business of this generation, and of generations to come, is the development and improvement of our own country, the upbuilding of our industries, and the establishment of our independence commercially, as it was long ago established politically. Our foreign commerce is a mere bagatelle when compared with our domestic trade; and instead of making the interests and prosperity of the latter dependent upon the former, I would much prefer to reverse their relations. Our country, more than any other, ancient or modern, possesses the elements of commercial independence, for it is capable of producing nearly all the natural and artificial commodities that enter into the wealth, the comfort, and the happiness of nations. That system of finance is the best which most promotes our internal growth and development, and under which we have so signally prospered.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President, I feel like apologizing for having made a speech on this subject of finance on the 24th of February, since it seems that what I said then has put the mountain in labor, and that mountain has brought forth, after a somewhat painful process of parturition, three full-grown elephants in measured succession.

I do not rise for the purpose of making another speech on the general subject, nor answering all that has been said by the Senators from Michigan, Illinois, and Indiana. Him that wants a complete answer, I refer to the more elaborate remarks I have already had the honor to submit at different times. Neither do I intend to add much to the arguments I have already made, for I think the subject has been sufficiently discussed. I merely for the present desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fundamental principles upon which those who advocate an expansion of the currency raise the structure of financial policy. Sir, when I want to discuss mathematics or geometry with any one, I shall require him to assent to certain fundamental propositions before we proceed; for instance, the proposition that two and two make four, and that a straight line is the shortest way from one point to another. When a gentleman who wants to discuss mathematics or geometry with me asserts that two and two may make four in another country but not here, and that the proposition that a straight line is the shortest way from one point to another may have been believed in five hundred years ago, but is not suited to the progressive spirit of our times, and that the shortest way from one point to another is a curve, I shall tell him, "You had better go to your horn-book, study your multiplication table, and look at Euclid, who may not have been born here, and who died several hundred years ago, but from whom, after all, you might derive some very valuable information."

Now, sir, when I hear, for instance, the Senator from Michigan say that the increase of the volume of an irredeemable currency does not cause its depreciation, and that the expansion of an irredeemable currency is equivalent to an accumulation of real wealth and real capital in its effects upon the rates of interest and business generally—when I hear him cry down such doctrines, then I am irresistibly driven to the conclusion that he is somewhat at loggerheads with the fundamental differences between real capital and irredeemable paper currency, and that the very first elementary principles of finance have not sufficiently been mastered by him. To build upon such a basis an argument of financial policy, would be like basing a demonstration in mathematics and geometry upon the proposition that two and two make five, and that a curve is the shortest line from one point to another. I might go through his speech for hours showing what wonderful things such a proposition may lead to, but I think I may safely spare the Senate the infliction.

The case is very similar with the honorable Senator from Illinois, when he tells us that the precious metals cannot remain the standard of value in any country, because the aggregate quantity of precious metals does not equal in value the aggregate of all the commodities to be measured; a proposition which I may say, by the way, seems to have been indorsed by the Senator from Michigan. But the Senator from Illinois caps the climax when he repeats, as he does in his second speech, that all the things that can be accomplished by drawing capital from abroad into this country by loans can also be accomplished by printing more irredeemable paper money here, thus, as he says, keeping the interest at home, just as if the issuing of more promises to pay were the actual creation of real wealth and capital, or as if the printing of irredeemable paper money could keep a nation out of debt. I cannot refrain from saying that I find the Senator bitterly at war with the very A B C of finance, and when he forms of such material the foundation of his financial policy, then we behold arguments and conclusions so utterly wild, so fantastic, so preposterous, nay, so monstrous, that it is difficult to understand how such things could have been uttered in the Senate of the United States. And when the Senator from Indiana says, as he has just now told us, that the effects of the inflation of an irredeemable currency are exactly the same as the effects of an increase of the volume of gold and silver, I might almost despair of arguing with him, and yet such ideas, such glaring aberrations of the human mind from all the grooves in which sound understanding moves, are to control the financial policy of this great Republic.

Mr. President, I have some ambition for this country. It grieves me when I see this Republic appear in an unfavorable light before the world. This financial discussion in the Senate of the United States has already attracted the attention of the foreign press, and I am sorry to say the absurdities uttered here have not escaped observation, and if we go on in this way, if such unheard-of propositions are to become the governing principles of our financial policy, we are in a very fair way of becoming the laughing-stock of civilized mankind.

As to the Senator from Indiana, I shall not go through his argument in order to controvert it from my stand-point, but I shall permit that Senator to answer himself. All he said, if it was to prove anything, was in fact an argument in favor of the perpetuation of an irredeemable paper money in this country; for he has taken great pains to show us how that irredeemable currency is preferable to gold and silver. I shall not follow the course of his remarks in their logical arrangement, but I shall take up one point after another. He has just been trying to convince us that an augmentation of the currency by some forty or fifty or more millions would not be inflation at all and would have none of the consequences of it. Now, let us see how the Senator judged of that subject not very long ago. In a debate upon a proposition contemplating the augmentation of the currency by twenty millions, the Senator from Indiana expressed himself in this wise:

I had hoped that the Senate had got past the time when it was necessary to argue the evils of the inflation of the currency—the general increase of speculation; the general diminution of productive industry and the resort to speculation instead. Does not every man know that the result of an inflation of the currency is to increase the price of everything that is bought and sold, first beginning with the price of personal property, then touching real estate, and then, perhaps, coming to labor?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It begins with labor.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator says it begins with labor. I submit that it is the experience of the world that the price of labor is the last thing that is inflated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator does not understand me. I mean to say that labor is the first thing to suffer from inflation.

Mr. MORTON. With that understanding I agree. It is the first thing to suffer from inflation, and the last thing to be proved by it. Sir, as soon as inflation takes place speculation begins; and what is the effect of it? Everything acquires two prices, the real price and the speculative price. * * * *

As I was remarking, Mr. President, when inflation begins property acquires two prices—the real, actual, demand price, and the speculative price. Men can put property into warehouses and hold it for a rise of prices, and thus, as we saw during the war and during this great inflation, the price of goods goes up 50, 150, 200, and 300 per cent., because of this speculative price brought about by the great abundance of money.

And, gentlemen, you will remember that just now the Senator asserted that the prices of commodities would never rise above the premium on gold!

But how is it with labor? You cannot put labor into a warehouse and hold it for future demand or speculation. The demand for labor is immediate, as labor is needed; and therefore, when inflation takes place, labor is the last thing to be inflated and the first thing to feel the evils of it. Mr. President, we have already suffered the evils of inflation. We have had one great inflation, and we have got part of the way down. It has cost the American people dearly in coming down.

Meaning the contraction of the currency which was effected by Secretary McCulloch.

The down grade is marked at every step by bankruptcies and ruin in every part of this country. Would the Senator from Ohio——

Whom he was then addressing—

Would the Senator from Ohio have us make the ascent again, that we may have again the ruinous descent? I trust not.—Congressional Globe, Fortieth Congress, second session, part 4, page 3157.

And now we see the same Senator from Indiana unblushingly advocating the ascent again so that we may experience all the beauties and blessings of that "ruinous descent" once more! This may serve also as a conclusive answer to the argument which he put forth in reply to mine, that the inflation of the currency, while it raised the price of agricultural products sold abroad only by the amount of the premium on gold, raises the price of general commodities beyond that premium, and obliged the farmer to sell at low and to buy at high prices. Here you have his own answer to his own argument.

The Senator has been entertaining us much upon what is the real cause of our difficulties. He now says that the nature of the currency has nothing to do with those difficulties. Not very long ago he held an opinion just the reverse of the one he expresses now. He then said:

Sir, we have a debased and depreciated currency to-day not worth more than seventy cents on the dollar. This lies at the foundation of all our financial troubles, and I believe the way to begin is to begin at the foundation, to take some step directly in the direction of returning to specie payment. Let us say to-day that we pledge the surplus gold in the Treasury and that which shall accumulate this financial year and the next to the redemption of the legal-tender notes, and the very moment that declaration becomes a law, in my opinion, the premium on gold will go down one-half.—Congressional Globe, Fortieth Congress, second session, part 4, page 4029.

So it turns out that his opinion of the nature and cause of our difficulties then has materially changed with the occasion, and what he now says had been refuted by himself before he uttered it.

Now, what does the Senator at this present moment desire to accomplish by expanding our irredeemable paper money? He tells us that he wants to give prosperity to the people; he wants to set the business of the country going again, and he loudly insists that the country must necessarily have more currency because the population has grown, and more currency is necessary per capita. Let the Senator from Indiana answer himself once more, and I desire him to listen to me, for this is rich:

A great many people have the idea that you can make money plenty by simply issuing it in large quantities, and a great many think it ought then to be distributed per capita, or in some other way, by which everybody should have some.—Congressional Globe, part 4, second session Fortieth Congress, page 3160.

How ridiculous such a bare-faced absurdity seemed to him then! How contemptuously he scorned the preposterous idea that whenever the population of a country grows the volume of the currency must necessarily be expanded in the same proportion! How he laughed at the childish conception, that by issuing irredeemable paper promises to pay you can make real money plenty! And yet the identical doctrines thus so justly ridiculed by him are now preached by the same gentleman as the highest financial wisdom.

Now let us see in what way he desires to accomplish his end. He is in favor of free banking, free banking upon the basis of an irredeemable currency without limit. Let us now examine the opinions the Senator from Indiana held on free banking not long since. On the 4th of February, 1873, but one short year ago, the Senator from Indiana delivered his opinion in the Senate of the United States in these words:

That brings me to the question of free banking. I do not know that I shall make objection to free banking when specie payments are absolutely and certainly restored beyond all peradventure; but it never ought to be ventured upon before that time, and I am not sure that it should then. Why? Because when banking is free and everybody can bank that desires to do so, the currency may be inflated scores of millions before the country knows scarcely anything about it. Now banks are formed here and there; they throw out their currency; the volume of it is increased; the country is not advised of it; and the first intelligence they get is from its influence on business. That is one of the very evils I am arguing against.

I know it is popular to talk about free banking and letting everybody go into it. Banking is seductive. A great many people have the idea that it is a very genteel business, and a very easy business, and a very profitable business; and when you make banking free, for the first two or three years there will be a great rush into that business, and after two or three years there will be a great rush out of it. You will first have an inflation and then you will have a contraction. I would a great deal rather that the volume of bank currency should be limited than to make it free, so that it may be increased or diminished by the operation of private individuals, and Congress and the nation have no control over it. But if we have free banking, it ought never to come until specie payments are permanently established, so that those banks shall absolutely redeem their notes in coin and we shall have that security against the inflation of the currency by the increased issue of bank-notes.

Thus spoke the Senator from Indiana on the 4th of February, 1873, in the very same seat from which he delivered his speech half an hour ago.

Now let us see what his opinion was then of the effect of the establishment of national banks in the West and South upon the amount of loanable money in the respective localities. The Senator has been arguing with a great deal of finesse against the argument put forth by myself, that by drawing out of the local circulation of a town in the South or West the money necessary for the purchase of bonds, and then establishing a national bank there, the amount of capital disposable for loans would be rather diminished than increased. He called it, I believe, preposterous. Now let us see what the Senator thought on that question before:

I should like to suggest to the Senators from the South that in my opinion they are chiefly interested in effecting a transfer of banking capital from the East to the South. Let me suppose that it is proposed to establish a bank in the city of Raleigh, North Carolina, by the citizens living there. They will buy their bonds at the great bond-market, the city of New York. They want to get a bank large enough to issue currency to the amount of $500,000. They must therefore deposit bonds to an amount 10 per cent. greater than the amount of currency they want to get. The bonds command a premium. Therefore, the citizens of Raleigh, North Carolina, to get their bank, must gather up $600,000 of currency and carry that to the city of New York for the purpose of buying their bonds in the first place, and after they get their bank organized they only get $500,000 of currency back. In other words, the operation would take out of the State of North Carolina $100,000 of currency more than it would get back by the establishment of the bank. Of course the bank itself would be profitable; the stockholders would make money; but so far as the currency in that State was concerned, the first operation would be to take out of the State $100,000 more than it would ultimately get back. But if a transfer of banking capital from the East to the West and South could be effected, the State of North Carolina would gain banking capital just to that extent.—Congressional Globe, first session Forty-first Congress, page 269.

And just there is the difference. To-day the Senator has been laboriously exerting himself to convince us that the mere establishment of national banks upon the basis of bonds bought with money drawn out of their home circulation would have just the effect that would be accomplished by the transfer of real banking capital from the East to the West or to the South.

Now, sir, let me expose another fallacy in connection with this subject which reappeared in his speech of to-day, for he employed almost the same language he had used in his reply, on the 24th of February, to my speech. He said then:

The argument made by the Senator from Missouri seems to proceed in total ignorance of the way banks are got up. How is a bank got up, if you please, in the city of Indianapolis? The men who want to start it go around with a subscription paper; get a mechanic to put down $1,000, a merchant to put down $2,000, another man $5,000, another man $500. They take it out of their business. That money was not loaned before; it was used in some other way. In that way they organize a bank, and the 90 per cent. comes back there as available funds to be loaned. That is the way banks are organized.

Yes, that is the way banks are organized; and now I would ask the Senator from Indiana, where do these men who subscribe two thousand, three thousand, and five thousand dollars get that money to put into the banks? He says they draw it out of their business. Do they draw out of their business money actively employed there? By no means. It must be a surplus they have laid up, and which they do not need in their business; otherwise they could not draw it out. Is not that obvious? But if it is a surplus, it was already in a loanable shape, ready to be invested in loans, before it was drawn out. No man would curtail the funds needed to keep his business going to put it into bank stock; only surplus funds are thus invested by business men. That is the way bank associations are organized and funds subscribed. The funds must already be free and ready to be loaned out. Suppose one bank is already there, and only a new one to be organized, then the money subscribed for the establishment of the new bank would, in ninety-nine cases of one hundred, have been deposited in the bank already there; it would have to be withdrawn from the existing bank, and to that amount diminish the loanable funds of that bank; and by being taken to New York for the purchase of bonds it would be a reduction of the loanable funds in the locality where the new bank is to be established. Is not this as clear as sunlight?

The great mistake that gentlemen are making in this matter is that they think it is merely a transformation of funded capital into loanable capital. It would indeed be such a transformation in such localities where funded capital already exists that can be transformed. The establishment of national banks in New England or in New York will indeed transform in that locality funded into loanable capital. But where such funded capital does not exist, or exists only in very small quantity, as in the West and South, you cannot speak of any transformation of it. There money must be drawn from the loanable funds already existing there, to be transformed into bonds to be purchased in New York, the bonds then to be transformed into national-bank currency, with a reduction of the loanable funds originally existing in the western or southern locality to the amount of 30 or 40 per cent., the operation yielding only ninety dollars of bank currency to every one hundred and twelve invested in bonds, and 15 or 25 per cent., respectively, of the bank currency being locked up as the legal reserve. My statement was therefore correct, and the Senator has utterly failed to controvert it.

The Senator from Indiana was also very emphatic to-day in speaking about the nonsense of talking of the violation of a pledge concerning the redemption of the Government paper promises to pay. He was of a very different opinion once. Not long ago it seemed to appeal to his moral nature that the United States, in promising to pay one dollar in gold for one dollar in currency, had indeed assumed a sacred obligation not to be violated without dishonor. Let us see what he said then:

Mr. President, this amendment proposes to increase the national banking currency to $400,000,000, and to retire an amount of United States notes equal to the addition proposed to the bank circulation. I do not think we are at liberty now to make this arrangement. We have recently passed an act entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit;" and that bill has given a solemn pledge to the country, which I suppose is as binding as any other pledge given in that act: "And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin." It would not be a compliance with that pledge, either in spirit or in letter, to propose to substitute for the United States notes, either in part or in whole, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, irredeemable bank-paper. That act provides that until we have returned to specie payments none of the interest-bearing obligations shall be redeemed or paid before maturity, and then solemnly pledges the faith of the nation to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin. It would be in direct violation of that pledge if, instead of making provision at the earliest practicable moment to redeem these notes in coin, we propose to retire them and to substitute for them an irredeemable bank-paper, for the redemption of which no provision is made.—Congressional Globe, Forty-first Congress, first session, 1869, page 269.

Now, sir, I think I have touched the main points of the Senator's speech. No; there was another thing which struck me as very remarkable in his utterances. It was his approval of the act of the Secretary of the Treasury in drawing upon the $44,000,000 reserve, not being specially authorized to do so by law. I would ask the Senator from Indiana now whether he considered that act legal?

Mr. MORTON. It is a question of doubt. There is some doubt about it. It is a question which has been ably argued on both sides. The preponderance of my opinion is that the Secretary of the Treasury had the right; but as there is a doubt in the public mind, I thought that doubt ought to be removed by legislation, and that the right to issue greenbacks up to $400,000,000 ought to be declared by law. I am very happy to be able to say that the House of Representatives has just so declared by about 100 majority.

Mr. SCHURZ. Now, let us see:

Mr. MORTON——

This was in the discussion on a bill stopping the further contraction of the currency to which the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] offered an amendment providing that the $44,000,000 already withdrawn should not be reissued again; and to that amendment the Senator from Indiana spoke as follows:

Mr. MORTON. I wish to say that I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] without giving any opinion on its merits, because I am opposed to hampering this bill by attaching any sort of rider to it. The apprehension expressed by the Senator from Vermont, that if this amendment is not adopted the Secretary of the Treasury will have a right to reissue legal-tenders so as to make the whole amount $400,000,000 again, I regard as without foundation. The law gave him authority to issue to the amount of $400,000,000, beside the reserve. When that amount was issued, his power was exhausted; and if it was afterward contracted down to $350,000,000, or to any amount, he has no authority without new legislation to issue to the amount of $400,000,000.—Congressional Globe, part 1, second session Fortieth Congress, 1867-'68, page 438.

Again, the Senator from Indiana spoke as follows:

I do not think it can be pretended for a moment by any Senator that the Secretary of the Treasury has power to issue a single note to replace those that have been canceled under the operation of the law we are now about to suspend. That pretense, I think, cannot be made by anybody, and therefore the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from New York will simply amount to an expression of opinion on a somewhat important question by this Senate. I think there is no occasion for it now.—Congressional Globe, part 1, second session Fortieth Congress, 1867, 1868, page 523.

It seems, then, that what the Senator considers so doubtful, or rather not doubtful at all, for we have heard the Senator express several times his opinion on this floor that the Secretary of the Treasury had a perfect right to issue the $44,000,000, was not considered doubtful by him then, but he looked at it in a very different light.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to the Senator also that the present Attorney-General in his remarks—for I have them—on that same occasion stated in the most emphatic language that by no possibility could the Secretary of the Treasury issue any of the $44,000,000; and every member of the Senate at that time on both sides—though the Senator from Vermont expressed his fear that such a question might be raised, and yet being opposed to the exercise of such a power—seemed to act on the idea that it was perfectly idle to legislate a provision against the $44,000,000 being issued, but that the Senator from Vermont desired to guard against the possibility of such a construction being put upon it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. May I ask the Senator from Ohio if the Attorney-General's opinion has ever been consulted by the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to this point as to the power to issue the $44,000,000?

Mr. SHERMAN. I can only answer that by speaking of a matter that I do not like to refer to here.

Mr. CONKLING. If I be allowed to interpose a moment, I want the Senator from Ohio to except me from the general statement he makes of the conviction of the Senate at that time. I did not act upon the idea which he now ascribes to the Senate, and the record will show that I did not.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator misunderstood me. I said no Senator was in favor of the exercise of the power of issuing the forty-four millions, although sixteen or seventeen Senators agreed that there might be a doubt about the construction of the law unless some amendment was adopted to guard against it.

Mr. CONKLING. Speaking for myself, I wish to say that I agreed that not only was there a doubt about this, but I was clear that it was incumbent on the Senate, if the Secretary was to be deprived of the power to issue any of the forty-four millions, to say so, and to say so in language which cannot be found in that bill, and I offered an amendment accordingly. I have not had occasion since to refer to the debate, or certainly not for a year or two; but I think it will turn out that I then filed my caveat against the idea that that legislation as it was perfected would prohibit the Secretary of the Treasury from issuing the forty-four millions or prevent his doing precisely what he has done.

Mr. SCHURZ. I think it was the Senator from New York to whom the Senator from Indiana referred in the last paragraph I have just read, as having offered an amendment to that effect.

Mr. SHERMAN. I also intended to say that, but I did not perhaps express myself clearly. I simply say that no Senator at the time was in favor of the granting the power to issue any portion of the forty-four millions.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Ohio said that no Senator at the time thought he had the power.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not say that, or if I did it was not what I intended. What I meant to say was that no one member of the Senate seemed to desire that the Secretary of the Treasury should have the power to issue forty-four millions at his pleasure; but a portion of the Senate, headed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] fearing that the Secretary might claim the power under the old law, moved as an amendment to deny him that power; and that was voted down on the ground, strongly stated by the Senator from Indiana and by the present Attorney-General and by myself, among others, that there was no such power, and that, therefore, the amendment was simply of no account and ought not to encumber the bill. That is now my recollection of the facts, and I think the amendment was voted down by a very large majority, perhaps 16 or 17 to about 30. It was voted down by a decided vote on that ground.

Mr. SCHURZ. Now, sir, we have heard as one of the principal objections to a return to specie payments the argument urged by the Senator from Indiana, that in the first place we had not gold enough in this country now, and in the second place we could not get gold enough. He said, I believe, that we had at the present moment about $140,000,000 of gold coin in the United States, and that would be absolutely insufficient to think of anything like the resumption of specie payments. The Senator must have been born abroad, I think, when he uttered the following sentiment in reply to a question whether we should have gold enough in the country to resume specie payments. The Senator said:

We shall have gold in the future as we have had in the past. There is no question about that. The Government can procure the gold without trouble. Let me suggest, in this connection, how are the banks to resume specie payments unless the Government does it? * * * * * * * *

When we have approached nearly the time of returning to specie payments, and when the premium on gold in this country is no more than 10 per cent. or 5 per cent., we can then, if we should need gold to the extent of thirty or forty millions, raise it upon our five-twenty bonds at par. Instead of converting greenbacks worth seventy cents into gold-bearing bonds, we can then in London raise as much gold as we want on our bonds at par, which are now selling at only seventy cents on the dollar in gold; and if there should be a deficit in gold, any small amount could be readily supplied at that time.—Congressional Globe, second session Fortieth Congress, page 3159.

In another paragraph of his remarks he spoke of only $150,000,000 of gold being necessary for the resumption of specie payments. But the principal and the most philosophical argument which the Senator from Indiana employs now against the resumption of specie payments is that it cannot be the result of legislation, but that it must be the growth of circumstances, the upshot of our condition; it is to be the result of the "situation," he thinks, and every legislative act that might turn us in that direction would be mischievous and attended with disaster and ruin. Let us see how the Senator from Indiana delivered himself upon that point:

Now, Mr. President, the most important thing for us to do, and the thing we ought to do, before this Congress adjourns, is to take some steps toward the return to specie payments. Every other financial scheme is a nostrum as compared with that. It cannot be done, nor can it be done indirectly. It will not "turn up," as Micawber might suppose it would. It will not come around incidentally or indirectly by resorting to some other gentle, ineffective, meaningless measure. Sir, the way to return to specie payments is by taking some direct step in that direction. As the Senator from Maine said, the only way to pay a debt is to pay it; and I say the only way to return to specie payments is by taking some step in that direction; some step that will give the country assurance that specie payments will be made. * * * * * * * *

Mr. President, in my judgment it is the first business of the Government to take some steps toward a return to specie payments; and, as I said before, and I wish to reiterate that statement, it is not to be done by wishing it; it is not to be done simply by some indirect and imperfect remedy, but it is to be done by some legislation looking directly toward it and making provision for it.—Congressional Globe, Fortieth Congress, second session, part 4, pages 3157 and 3158.

Now, Mr. President, when we compare the opinions uttered by the Senator from Indiana to-day with the deliberate opinions which he uttered time and again on this floor upon the very same subject, then we may arrive at the conclusion that he was right when, in opening one of his speeches on finance, he very candidly said:

I do not pretend to have much faith in my own judgment on the subject of finance.

[Laughter.]

Nobody will question the correctness of the Senator's feelings in that respect now.

Sir, it seems to me that when we treat of a matter as important as this, involving not only the material prosperity, but even the moral well-being of the people of the United States, we should not have our opinions hanging so loosely about us that we change them from day to day like our coats.

I predict the time will come, and is not very far off, when the Senator from Indiana, recognizing the miscarriage of his inflation vagaries, will complete the circle and land again on the basis of specie payments; and then some belated inflationist on this floor may rise up in the Senate of the United States and quote the speech which he has made to-day, and he will present the sorry spectacle of recanting once more. I do not envy him; but it is his doing.

Sir, when I uttered the very same sentiments which I have now been reading from his speeches, he gave me to understand that I was born abroad, and that I did not know anything about the affairs of this country! I should like to know where the Senator was born two or three years ago!

Mr. President, I said I would not go over the whole argument that was brought forward by the Senators from Michigan and Illinois, but, in conclusion, I desire to touch here a very practical point. The Senator from Indiana is always speaking about the situation. It may be somewhat annoying to him and those on his side if, in a very simple way, I bring them face to face with the situation.

If it can be shown that there is already so much money in the market that the banks are fairly overflowing with it, and that there is a superabundance of loanable funds beyond the capacity of the business community to use it, I ask, what will they have to say of the situation then?

Now let us see. I must trouble the Senate with reading some of those very inconvenient things, the money-market reports; and inasmuch as reference has been made to my own city of Saint Louis, I shall commence with that.

The Saint Louis Democrat of March 14, 1874, says:

We have no change to report in regard to the condition of the local money market. The story told by the banks from day to day does not vary a particle, and it is next to impossible to discover anything new or interesting in regard to money matters. There is a superabundant supply of loanable funds in the hands of all the banks, which keeps steadily augmenting by the steady receipts of currency from the interior and the daily run of deposits. The demand is confined to the very smallest amount possible, even below that of midsummer, which is usually the dullest time of the year. There is one feature in the market that is rather singular, when the plethora of funds is taken into consideration, and that is the banks are disposed to risk but little, and are just as careful in the scrutiny of the paper that is now offering as they were when the market was so stringent, and, while strictly first-class paper is in demand, discount lines have not been extended so as to go outside of this class; hence, if all the paper that offered was accommodated, we should be able to chronicle a more active feeling in the discount market.

Thus it appears that in the city of Saint Louis not only is there a superabundance in the banks, but that superabundance is daily augmented by currency flowing into the city banks from the country, where we are told that the people are starving for currency.

Next, I turn to the Cincinnati Commercial of March 19:

The demand for money continues light and the market is easy, with a further accumulation of means at most of the banks, and depositors in good credit obtain all of the money they desire at 8 to 9 per cent. Call loans are obtainable at 6 to 8 per cent.—the inside rate on strictly first-class collaterals. Outside of bank there is a fair amount of paper offered, and it is readily placed at 8 to 10 per cent.—the inside figure for strictly prime business notes.

The demand for eastern exchange is light and scarcely equal to the current receipts, but the counter rates are firm, and there being no pressure to sell, it is difficult to buy round sums under 1-20 per cent. discount.

The Saint Louis Dispatch, the last I received, of March 20, says:

There was a moderate counter business at the principal financial institutions this morning. The offerings of acceptable paper are light, and loanable funds, under the light demand, are in good supply. Rates from banks are easy at 8 to 10 per cent. per annum.

The Chicago Inter-Ocean of March 11 reports:

Outside of a firmer feeling in exchange, there was no particular change to note in the course of local financial affairs. The demand for money continues light, and borrowers obtain all the accommodations they desire, especially on grain and provisions. Outside paper accepted occasionally at some of the banks, though only for short dates. Eastern exchange firmer at fifty cents premium between banks. Counter rates without quotable change. Gold steady. Government securities quiet. Local stocks without material change.

Again, March 13, the Inter-Ocean:

The demand for money continues moderate, and bankers are well supplied with loanable funds, but prefer to select their customers. Short-date paper has the preference, and most of the offerings come from the grain and provision interest. Wholesale merchants make few applications, and generally succeed in obtaining all favors they desire on the street. Money is quiet and the offerings are moderate. Rates of interest unchanged.

The Senator from Illinois asks me in an undertone whether I read an editorial. We have nothing to do with editorial opinions now, but we have to deal with facts, and all the papers of the country in their market reports agree that the banks are overflowing with loanable funds, and that there is more supply than there is demand. They all agreeing, the Inter-Ocean included, there must be truth in it, whatever the editorials of the papers may say.

The Chicago Tribune of Friday evening, March 20, reports:

Financial affairs continue stagnant, and the supply of money offered for loan on prime security is larger than can be employed. As remarked a day or two ago, the prospect is that the supply of money in this market will increase rather than otherwise, as the holders of the large amount of pork and provisions here realize on what they hold.

There is more from Chicago, which it is not necessary to read.

The Cincinnati Gazette of Monday morning, March 13, says in its money-market report:

The movements in monetary circles as far as the demand for money is concerned are sluggish. The chief reason for this is that merchants are less in debt than usual; they bought lightly of goods for several months succeeding the panic, and their more recent purchases are not yet due. Currency continues to flow in from the country, and the supply is becoming redundant.

The Indianapolis Journal of March 14 says:

The money market is rather dull as compared with the same date in other years. The banks seem to be better prepared with funds than was the case a week or two ago, but the rates of discounts are unchanged. There is no particular pressure for loans. New York exchange is in fair supply, and selling between banks at par and to bank customers at 1-8 to 1-10 per cent.

The Louisville Courier-Journal of March 20 says:

The market for money displayed a fair degree of activity to-day, and lenders—

are not complaining so generally of the dullness of the times.

I repeat, not the borrowers, but the lenders have been complaining because they could not get employment for the money they had accumulated in the banks.

The inquiry was by no means spirited, though the majority of the banks found satisfactory employment for their disposable funds, while others are carrying a larger surplus than they consider desirable. In the open market there are comparatively few borrowers, and good real-estate paper of all classes is in demand. There is no change to notice in rates.

I do not know whether it is necessary to go through the whole budget which I have before me, some thirty or forty market reports from all the different commercial cities of the Union, to exactly the same effect. Of course it is superfluous that I should read anything from New York or Boston.

I ask you now what does all this mean? It means that the business centers are full of money; that the supply of loanable funds is actually larger than the demand; that the same I have stated of the cities is the fact in the country, too, which is demonstrated by the circumstance that money is continually flowing from the country banks into the city banks. Yes, the supply exceeds the demand, and not the demand the supply. There is far more loanable money in those banks than can find ready investment on good security. All market reports without exception tell the same story.

I ask again, what is the meaning of this? Does it mean that there is an insufficiency of currency in the country? Would not such an assertion be the very height of preposterosity? Quite the reverse; there is more currency than can at present be employed in the business transactions going on, as every financial authority shows. To be sure, there are people who find difficulty in getting their notes discounted, or in obtaining loans at such rates of interest as they desire. That has always been the case, and always will be the case. But, I ask, is that a proof of an insufficiency of the currency? Those people, of course, will tell you that they cannot get all the loans they want because there is not enough currency in the country. But is it true? There is money in abundance seeking safe investment, and much of it not being able to find that safe investment. The difficulty is not, therefore, that there is not currency enough, but the difficulty is that those persons who cannot get loans have not credit enough. And do you think you can give them credit by merely putting out more currency? If there is a lack of anything, it is not a lack of currency, but it is a lack of confidence. Cannot gentlemen tell the difference between a lack of currency and a lack of confidence? And how does that lack of confidence arise? Is there anything very wonderful in it?

We have gone through a great financial crisis. In that crisis a great many business men who had ventured upon more or less hazardous enterprises were caught. Business that was overdone before the crisis has to a great extent come to a stand-still. Production that before the crisis went beyond actual demand has been arrested. Consumption which before the crisis went beyond the limits of a wise economy has to a certain extent been stopped also. Lenders of money have become somewhat cautious in their investments, for a great many lost during the crisis, and now they are looking those carefully in the face who come to them and want money; they desire safe security. And borrowers of money who by reckless operations got themselves into trouble before and during the crisis are carefully calculating their chances before they strain their credit to the same extent again. Business men are cautious in their enterprises and their engagements. The business of the country is slowly feeling its way from the quicksands of a great crisis upon safe ground. That is the occasion of the lack of confidence. It is the natural consequence of the crisis. And now you will remove that lack of confidence by an additional issue of currency, while the banks are literally overflowing with loanable funds already?

No candid man will question the fact, for every money report from every part of the country tells us the same story. And now I would ask what, in the name of common sense, do you, under such circumstances, want to issue more currency for, while you have only to open your eyes to the actual state of the case to know that there is already more loanable money in the market than will find responsible takers? I ask you are we not serious men? Are we mere little boys playing at finance? Or can anybody here on this floor, any Senator of the United States, really mean to inflate the currency merely for the purpose of further depreciating it, and creating more ruinous fluctuations of values? Can that iniquitous mischief—and I call it so knowing what I say—can that iniquitous mischief be the thing anybody here wants to bring about? If that is the case, then I wish the gentlemen would have at least the boldness to say so. Or is there really anybody here so childish as to indulge in the delusion that we can issue currency enough to provide everybody with as large a loan, without sufficient security, and at as low a rate of interest, as he desires? Can so senseless, so idiotic a conception be seriously entertained?

Certainly, gentlemen, as men of sense and experience, you cannot mean that; you cannot indulge in the impossible notion that an additional issue of currency, were it ten thousand millions, can effect that. And yet it would almost seem that something of the kind must be contemplated, for it is difficult to explain the inflation schemes presented here upon any other theory, unless it be that willful and wicked mischief of which I have just been speaking. But if that kind of statesmanship, so utterly ignoring the first elementary principles, the very A B C of finance, that statesmanship looking for objects so wild, so senseless, so mischievous, so sure to lead to disappointment, disgrace, and ruin—if that kind of statesmanship is ready to assume and keep control of the finances of the United States, then I say may the Lord have mercy on the American people.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I am sorry to say another word on this matter, but the Senator from Missouri, it will be remembered, referred, in the Senate a few days ago, to certain expressions of mine, and endeavored to convert them into a reflection upon his foreign birth.

Mr. SCHURZ. Let me tell the Senator from Indiana that I do not want to renew the discussion on this matter. I am willing to believe that he has no prejudice against the foreign-born citizens; and when I referred to it I did so simply because he had reiterated something of the kind in his speech. He spoke of people coming from Germany, knowing the old country, wanted to apply the theories they had learned there to this country, and that they were sitting on the steps of the Capitol and reading the inscriptions on the Pyramids, and all that sort of thing. I am willing to think him innocent of prejudice against foreign-born citizens if he does not show any.

Mr. MORTON. I hope now that will be the end of it. The Senator, in the course of the few remarks he has submitted, again referred to the fact that he was of foreign birth, and referred to a former declaration of mine which he construed as referring to his foreign birth. Now, if the Senator does not want to parade that fact almost constantly before the public, he had better not seek to put any construction upon remarks of mine or other Senators to that effect. I have no prejudice against any man on account of his birth, and I never have had such prejudice. I never sympathized with know-nothingism. For a man who claims superior merit because he was born on our soil, I have little respect; I never had any for German know-nothingism, or Irish know-nothingism either. I have not much respect for those who are foreigners by profession, and parade that fact on all occasions.

Now, Mr. President, a word or two in regard to the argument. The Senator shows that he is quite familiar with my speeches. He has been hunting up the record. He has followed in the path of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] some two or three weeks ago. I think my friend from Ohio spent about two hours on that interesting subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not more than five minutes.

Mr. MORTON. Yes; a good deal more than that, as my friend will see if he will look at the RECORD. He could not get it all into five minutes. He read extensively and commented still more extensively; and when I turned to my friend's speech to show that he stood on different ground than he stands on now, he had little more to say. I have no doubt the record of the Senator from Missouri would be in the same predicament on that subject if he had any, but I do not know that he has any; and if he has I shall not take the trouble to hunt it up. I really think it is scarcely worth the labor.

Mr. SCHURZ. I do not think it would pay.

Mr. MORTON. But now the Senator shows that he is quite familiar with my record. I thought so when he made his speech two or three weeks ago; as he went along, I thought he had been reading my speech, made in 1869. Of course I do not believe he would take my speech bodily, but it struck me as remarkable that his mind should run in precisely the same groove mine had run in some four or five years before that time. The resemblance was striking; and I took my old speech and went over it after he got through, and I was forcibly struck to see how the two minds had traveled in the same path; mine happened to have gone over it about four or five years before; the Senator followed afterward. There was much the same order. Of course, there was a different dress. The dress was greatly improved, because fashions in dress have improved since that time. [Laughter.] But really, it was about the same thing. I did not say anything about it at the time. I thought if my friend wanted to make a speech on that side, he could not do better than take my old speech.

Now, Mr. President, there is one thing in the speech made by my friend from Missouri a few weeks ago, which has attracted more attention in the country than anything else he has said, and that is his argument in regard to persons who wanted to establish banks in the West, taking $1,120 out of circulation in the neighborhood, going to New York to buy bonds to establish a national bank, leaving $1,120 there and getting only $900 in currency in return. I recognized that at once, and my friend has shown to-day just where he got that idea from precisely. [Laughter.] I did not say a word about its origin, for I was a little ashamed of it myself. [Laughter.] I thought it was a tolerably good thing when I got it off; then it seemed to me to be plausible; but on reflection I was satisfied there was no sense in it. But the Senator has shown by referring to my speech on the bank bill just where he got it. There was one thing a little curious, that when the Senator put forth that idea some three weeks ago, for which he has got more credit than everything else in that speech—I say this because it has been more quoted and published than anything else—when he put that out, he forgot to give credit for it. But I do not care anything about that. I want to say, however, that it was not original with me. I think I had seen it somewhere else, and fell into the trap.

Mr. CONKLING. Where did you borrow it? [Laughter.]

Mr. MORTON. I have no idea where I got it. [Laughter.] I think it was anonymous when I got it; but the Senator had a responsible indorser for it; and he took it without giving me credit for it. I think I have answered that to-day, as I have been satisfied there was a true answer to it for a long time.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say to my friend from Missouri that I made that argument in 1869 against inflation, and I made it in favor of specie payments. I had "specie payments on the brain" then about as badly as he has now. The Senator follows along in my path a few years afterward. When I made that speech I was in favor of taking immediate steps to return to specie payments. I had a plan. My friend from Ohio disagreed with it. A large body of the Senate disagreed with it. They thought that specie payments could not be wrought out in the way the Senator has pointed out, or that I pointed out, or that anybody else has pointed out since that time. A considerable portion of the Senate has changed its mind, I infer, on that subject.

But, sir, the circumstances are widely different now from what they were when I spoke against inflation in 1869. There was then certainly $150,000,000 more of currency than there is now, while to-day there are in the country certainly not less than four millions more people and infinitely more wealth and business than at that time. Placed back at that point, I should perhaps take the same view I then did under the circumstances; but I have changed my views on several questions in regard to finance, I am free to admit. I think there is no shame about it; and whenever I shall be satisfied that I am now wrong, I shall be frank to admit it. I think that that pride which induces a man to continue in error is false, and is one of those things from which statesmen and politics suffer more than almost anything else.

One word in regard to the $400,000,000 issued by the Secretary of the Treasury. I had the impression when that matter was first brought into the Senate that after the currency had been contracted to $356,000,000 there was no law for the reissue of the $44,000,000. I thought so, and I think nearly everybody in the Senate thought so, at that time. Perhaps my friend from New York [Mr. CONKLING] was an exception; but that was the general opinion at that time. There had been no argument made on it; but after I saw the argument made by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the argument made by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT,] on the question, I changed my mind about it; at least I thought there was a prima facie case in favor of the power. I believe the Secretary of the Treasury acted in good faith, and if he had not issued the $27,000,000 as he did, what would he have done for money to carry on the Government? There was a strong argument of necessity backing up at that time the legal right to issue that reserve.

Mr. President, I had intended to say nothing more on this subject.

Mr. WRIGHT. I merely wish to add one word touching a question that was referred to by the Senator from Indiana, just as he closed his remarks. I was not a member of the Senate at the time the question arose whether there should be additional legislation to prevent the increase of the legal-tenders up to $400,000,000; and therefore of the opinions that were entertained by Senators at that time of the necessity of that legislation I know nothing except as I have investigated them in the Globe since. But inasmuch as it has been assumed here more than once that no lawyer could possibly entertain the opinion that there was any power in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury to increase beyond $356,000,000, and that any one entertaining that opinion maintained a position which no one could defend. Without any purpose at this time to enter into the discussion, I merely wish to quote what has been decided by the highest tribunal of this land, and the opinion written, too, by the Chief Justice of that court, who at the time these greenbacks were issued was the Secretary of the Treasury. I doubt not this question will come up again when the bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on Finance this morning shall come before the Senate; but whether it should or not, lest any one may conclude that there is but one side to this question, I merely wish to read one sentence from what was decided by that court.

Something has been said about the opinion of the Attorney-General and about the opinions of Senators on this floor at the time this question was before the Senate. I only wish to read one sentence from what was decided by the court. In the case of The Banks vs. The Supervisors, (7 Wallace, 26,) the Chief Justice, who was Secretary of the Treasury at the time of the passage of the acts therein referred to, says:

> The act of February 25, 1862, provided for an issue of these notes to the amount of $150,000 000. The act of July 11, 1862, added another $150,000,000 to the circulation, reserving, however, $50,000,000 for the redemption of temporary loans, to be issued and used only when necessary for that purpose. Under the act of March 3, 1863, another issue of $150,000,000 was authorized, making the whole amount authorized $450,000,000, and contemplating a permanent circulation, until resumption of payments in coin, of $400,000,000.

Not $356,000,000, but contemplating a permanent circulation of $400,000,000. The same view was again expressed by the Chief Justice in the case of Veazie Bank vs. Fenno, (8 Wallace, 537.)

I have no wish or purpose of entering into the discussion of this question now; but lest it might be assumed by Senators here that there was no view opposite to what had been alleged, I thought it necessary to refer thus briefly to what had been decided by the highest tribunal in this land. I attempted, in my feeble way and humble way, to discuss this question in a report I made from the minority of the Finance Committee, and I have had no reason to change the views I then expressed. I believe the views there expressed contain the law of this question, and I shall be prepared to so maintain if the question shall hereafter arise.

Mr. BAYARD obtained the floor.

Mr. SCHURZ. If the Senator from Delaware will permit me, I should like to say a word in response to the——

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. SCHURZ. I merely want to state the fact that some Senator came to me quite seriously and asked me whether I was going to rest under the imputation of having taken that argument to which the Senator from Indiana referred, from the Senator's old speech. Well, I should have been willing to let the Senator have his little joke—his only comfort—undisturbed; but now after having been approached so solemnly, I fear I cannot. No, I did not take this or any other of my arguments from anything the Senator from Indiana ever said. I never was under such a necessity. But as the Senator from Indiana has just asserted that it is the true business of statesmanship to change one's opinion, then I will admit that he is one of the model statesmen of the age, for I know scarcely a question of great importance that I have not seen him on both sides of in somewhat rapid succession.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator makes the statement that he does not know an important question on which I have not changed sides. That is true, or it is not true. It is easy to say that as a rhetorical embellishment or as an answer; but it is either true or it is not true. On main questions and important questions, I have not changed. I have changed my opinions upon several questions, and I suppose the Senator has his. I know that he was once in full accord with the republican party. He fell out with it, left it, and did all he could to destroy it. Had he changed his opinion? I think he had. He had changed his spirit. It was his right to do so. I do not blame him. But when he talks about not changing his opinions, and says that I have changed upon all important questions, it is not true.

Mr. SCHURZ. The difficulty with the Senator from Indiana is that he changes his opinions always for the worse. To a change for the better I should have no objection. Now, sir, I address you who are sitting there so solemnly and seriously in the chair of the Senate of the United States, do we not all remember that you, sir, not a great many years ago, took up a Congressional Globe and showed to the Senator from Indiana that on one of the main points of the reconstruction policy he had asserted just the contrary of the proposition which he was advocating just at the time? You remember it as well as I do, and everybody on this floor.

Mr. MORTON. No, sir. No such Globe or speech can be found. The Senator did not, but others did, drag in an old speech I had made in Indiana in 1865. That is about the best argument that has generally been made, in which I said that I was in favor of negro suffrage, but that there ought to be a period of probation of ten or fifteen years. Afterward, when I found we could not reconstruct on the white basis, and when we had to give the negroes the right of suffrage at once, I was in favor of it. But I always believed in negro suffrage on principle; but I did think at one time that they were hardly in a condition to go squarely to the polls at once; and because I said so, that is dragged up in support of a general declaration here that I have changed my mind upon all subjects.

Why I remember on that very question—the Senator was not here at the time—but in 1864 a bill was before the Senate to provide a law for the reconstruction of the rebel States. It was to be ready-made, and to be on hand for use as soon as the rebellion was put down. It passed both Houses; it received every republican vote in the Senate. Mr. Lincoln put it in his pocket, refused to sign it; and that bill confined the right of suffrage absolutely to white men; and if Mr. Lincoln had signed that bill which Charles Sumner and Benjamin F. Wade and HENRY WILSON and all those men voted for, the negroes would not have had the right of suffrage during the nineteenth century, and I do not know that they ever would. But Mr. Lincoln refused to sign that bill, wiser than he knew, perhaps. I never would have voted for that bill, I think. I never went that far since the war began in regard to negro suffrage. But that is the relief the Senator finds in support of his statement.

I think I could turn over an old report the Senator made, when he was sent down by Andrew Johnson, in the service of Andrew Johnson, to the South, to make a report on the condition of the Southern States, in which he took very different ground from what he has done within the last two or three years. I have not got that report at hand, but my recollection of it is that the Senator has changed his views radically on some very important questions. I think he has a right to do so, and that he ought to be governed by the circumstances in which he is placed. But when he makes general statements of that kind he ought to be sure in the first place that he has no record; or, if he has one, that nobody knows what it is.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President, now I am sorry I gave rise to a speech on negro suffrage, because——

Mr. MORTON. The Senator referred to it himself.

Mr. SCHURZ. I did not refer to that matter at all.

Mr. MORTON. You did not?

Mr. SCHURZ. No; I referred to another occasion, and the Senator now reminds me of case No. 3. I referred to a case, if I remember rightly, in connection with the Georgia reconstruction bill; and from your smiles, Mr. President, I see that you remember it but too well. But on the whole I think it is just as well to break off the discussion, as the Senator from Indiana himself must be aware that his assertion that he had never, or but very rarely, changed his opinions on important subjects has afforded considerable amusement to the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the Senator makes an insinuation about the Georgia reconstruction case. Upon my word, I think he had better not leave it an insinuation, for that is all it is. If I have been inconsistent on that subject, I am not aware of it; but I think I am right thus far in regard to it, that about that time the Senator was changing his opinions. Awhile before that he had been among the most earnest in the land in support of the rights of colored men and securing them the right of suffrage; but he has never uttered a word or given a vote in that direction since.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President, the fundamental propositions of the republican platform are specie payments and civil-service reform. I am sure I have always been in favor of those.

Mr. MORTON. So far as a civil-service reform is concerned, I want to say one word. My friend distinguished himself some years ago, when, I think, the very first speech he made in the Senate was on the subject of civil-service reform. I think he had an idea that parties were to be revolutionized at that time by that matter. I think about that time he was contemplating the destruction and subversion of the republican party in the State of Missouri which had sent the Senator here; but after General Grant took up the subject of civil-service reform, and did a good many practical things in that direction, I think the Senator has not had a word to say in favor of it since then. Has anybody heard him? I have no recollection of it for the last two or three years.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, when the Secretary of the Treasury was called to account by the public sentiment of the country to show his warrant for issuing irredeemable paper money from the Treasury, to show by what authority of law he had undertaken to reissue the reserve which, according to the law which created it, consisted of Treasury notes retired and canceled, it was not surprising that he should catch at every straw and seek for every pretense to sustain himself before a justly alarmed condition of public sentiment. And, sir, in 1872, when this most dangerous act had been first essayed by the then Secretary of the Treasury, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] and he was called to account instantly by Congress upon its convention in December, 1872, he did not pretend to find law for it, but he found simply pressure, and in the report that he made to the House of Representatives on the 13th of December, 1872, he stated, in the first place, that he (the Secretary of the Treasury) had not issued this five millions—for that was the amount then issued—but that his assistant had done so in his absence, and he proceeded to give his authority for it, and reasoned in the following words:

> The object of the issue was the relief of the business of the country, then suffering from the large demand for currency employed in moving the crops from the South and West. The condition of affairs then existing in this country seems to me to have warranted the issue upon grounds of public policy.

So said Mr. BOUTWELL in December, 1872. He had not then discovered the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States for this issue; and his successor had not discovered it in the fall of 1873; for when he was applied to by the merchants of New York upon an occasion which the Senator from Indiana very well remembers, for he was present at the time, in the midst of that excitement, and when the President of the United States seemed disposed to yield to the demand, the answer of the Secretary of the Treasury, as published in the papers of the day, was that there was no lawful authority for the issue, and that the Administration must obey the law as Congress had provided it. That was his answer made to the public at that time. But in 1874, the present Senator from Massachusetts in the Senate paraded the same book and the same fragment of the case which I have to-day been astonished that so experienced a lawyer and able a judge as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] should read to the Senate gravely as an authority for the issue of that paper. Would it not have been in accordance with his well-known caution and experience for him to have had the whole case before him before he undertook to read a mere fragment, tearing it from the context and destroying the meaning of the case by the part which he read? It is true that in 1868, in the case of The Banks vs. The Supervisors of Taxes of the city of New York, to be found in 7 Wallace, page 28, the Chief Justice of the United States, in deciding the question whether or not greenback notes could be taxed under the State laws of New York, proceeded to recite the history of the creation of those notes. He gave it in the language which the Senator from Iowa has read as the decision of the court.

Sir, that was not the decision of the court; it was a mere recital of that portion of the history of the emission of this paper which was necessary for a decision of that case. And when the court came to decide the case it was placed upon grounds which did in no way involve the dictum which the portion of the decision that he has read apparently contained; for after the Chief Justice had read the language which has been here repeated by the Senator from Iowa, and which was repeated by the Senator from Massachusetts the other day, which is contained in a mere fragment in the book from which he reads, the court go on and in the next sentence say this:

> It is unnecessary here to go further into the history of these notes, or to examine their relation to the national-bank currency. That history belongs to another place, and the quality of these notes as legal-tenders belongs to another discussion. It has been thought proper only to advert to the legislation by which these notes were authorized in order that their true character may be clearly perceived.

That is to say, he referred to the legislation of 1862 and 1863, and there stopped. Was anything said in that decision of the legislation of 1866 by which the contraction of the volume of the United States currency was distinctly ordered by Congress? This legislation was in pursuance of the recommendation of the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McCulloch, followed by a resolution of Congress, passed almost unanimously, that the contraction should take place of the volume of the currency as a necessary step towards specie payments. After that the law of April, 1866, was passed, which declared that the currency should be contracted by retiring and canceling a certain amount of notes, provided only that it should not be in excess of ten millions in the first six months and four millions in any month thereafter; and under the policy of returning to specie payments by a contraction of the volume of the Treasury notes, the Secretary of the Treasury proceeded, under the direct authority of the law of 1866, not mentioned or referred to by Chief Justice Chase in this decision, to contract the volume of the currency until forty-four millions had been retired. Then speculators took alarm; then it was that, coming before Congress, they succeeded in having the legislation of 1868 passed declaring that contraction should cease and that no further notes should be retired and canceled under the law of 1866.

Now, sir, is it possible that you are to take, as a decision that this $44,000,000 was not to be canceled and retired, the legislation that preceded the direction to cancel and retire, and not refer to that under which it was done? Sir, although the Senator from Iowa made an exceedingly respectable argument, and one entitled to weight from his character and ability as one of the minority of the Finance Committee, on this subject, he had not this new light before him then, nor did he refer to it; nor would he have referred to it now, I am sure, if he had taken the trouble to send for the report of the case, and not have taken the mere fragment which the Secretary of the Treasury saw fit to embody in this compendium of Treasury law which he has lately issued.

Mr. President, in 1870, seven years after the last act which Chief Justice Chase was considering in the decision in 7 Wallace, was passed the new funding law in reference to the United States bonds, and the same language precisely was there used in regard to the bonds which were to be taken up by the issue of new ones as is used in regard to the Treasury notes which were to be retired and canceled under the law of 1866. In either case the direction was the same; in regard to the notes, it was to retire and cancel them; in the case of the bonds, it was to retire and cancel them. Those words have a well-ascertained, natural, effective meaning; and it seems to me incredible that gentlemen, after having seen statutes passed by Congress declaring the policy to be a contraction of the volume of the currency and declaring what currency was to be contracted, and after having permitted that to go on for two years, and then declaring that the contraction should cease, should after all say that contraction was not intended to be contraction, and that "retiring" and "cancellation" were words of empty meaning, which in effect contained authority for the Secretary of the Treasury at his will to issue the notes again.

Mr. President, I adverted to this subject in some remarks which I submitted to the Senate on the 28th of January; and I there further showed that when it was the intention of Congress to permit the reissue of notes retired and canceled they said so. I referred to the statute of February 4, 1868, by which it was provided—

> That from and after the passage of this act the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to make any reduction of the currency by retiring or canceling United States notes shall be, and hereby is, suspended.

That put an end to his power of retiring or canceling further than the forty-four millions; and in the next sentence it was provided—

> But nothing herein contained shall prevent the cancellation and destruction of mutilated United States notes and replacing the same with notes of the same character and amount.

Now, sir, where you have in the same law and in the same section a direction to retire and cancel one class of notes, and then a declaration that that provision shall not relate to a totally different class of notes, to wit, mutilated currency, but that when that shall be retired and canceled, its place shall be refilled by the issue of other notes, can it be that there is a fragment of authority left to say that there was law for the reissue of those notes, which, after the solemn declaration of a policy of contraction by Congress, the Secretary of the Treasury had been ordered to retire and cancel, and which he had reported that he had retired and canceled?

Mr. President, there has been nothing in the present condition of our finance, sad and deplorable as it is, which has filled me with the same degree of alarm and apprehension as has this disregard of public law by the higher officials of the country. This was intended to be a government of laws. No officer was intended to be higher than the law; and the higher the officer, the stricter, the more obligatory upon him the duty to obey the law in the exercise of his high place; and yet we have seen in 1872, and to a still greater extent in 1873, what I do declare to be a most flagrant, monstrous violation of the law, leading to the most dangerous results, namely, the power of a Secretary of the Treasury, at his own will and pleasure, under circumstances of whose potency he alone is the judge, in his own discretion solely, to pass by the plain laws of the land that gave him his authority, and issue irredeemable paper money of the United States Government in a time of profound peace, and to such a volume as he sees fit, and then to recall it again at his pleasure. Why, sir, give any man such an authority as that, and if he went into office an angel of light, he could not remain there without corruption. It would be impossible but that either men would use him, or he himself would fall into that danger. I have been astonished since this Congress met that those who have control of the affairs of this country, gentlemen in these Chambers who represent the dominant party of this country, have not challenged this exercise of authority and insisted upon his strictly proving his warrant, or directly impeaching him from an office whose trust he had betrayed.

It will not do to attempt by citing here a mere fragment, a mere recital, a mere obiter dictum of a case, to call that a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, that laws passed in 1863 are not to be affected by direct legislation on the same subject in 1866 and 1868. The only justificatory argument is an attempt to take a mere obiter dictum contained in a decision, the mere recital of a historical fact under the law of 1863, and to say that it overrides the subsequent legislation of Congress and forms a decision in favor of the violation of a law which I consider, with the majority of the Committee on Finance, is as clear as sunlight.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, when I made the remark that I did just now, it was with no purpose of entering into this discussion at this time; nor is it my purpose now. I deem it, however, due to myself and the member of the committee who agreed with me not to let pass unchallenged what had been said here on this subject, and not to-day alone but on prior days. Indeed Senators seem to have treated it as a matter that was so clearly and unquestionably settled that it was utterly surprising that any person should entertain a contrary opinion to theirs. Having in my humble way attempted to show that the true construction of the statutes was the other way, I confess that I felt at times that by possibility I could not have a correct opinion upon this or any other subject. Indeed, Senators went on and spoke of the decision that had been made and spoke of the legislation, and, like the Senator from Delaware who has just taken his seat, said that it passed their comprehension that Congress should be allowed to pass on day after day, and that this Secretary of the Treasury should not be impeached; and he has just expressed his utter surprise that the majority on this floor should have allowed so flagrant a violation of law to pass without comment, without any effort to stop this violation of law.

Mr. President, holding, as I have already attempted to show in the report that I made, that the law was otherwise, I confess that at times I have felt as if the opinion of the minority was being treated with the utmost disrespect. Now, the question before the Senate is not one of whether it was wise to intrust the Secretary of the Treasury with this power; it is not whether he did wisely or unwisely exercise the discretion with which he was intrusted; the question is, what was the law at the time he acted? It may have been most unwise to have left the law so. It may have been most unwise on his part to have decided as he did, or to have exercised the discretion with which he was intrusted as he did. With that I have nothing to do at present. Nor had I anything to do with it at the time that I attempted to maintain the views which I expressed in my report. The question was, what was the law as it stood at the time he acted?

It was said here this morning, it has been said in this debate, that no Senator on this floor entertained the opinion that the power existed in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue this $44,000,000; that no such opinion was entertained at the time the amendment was offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the act of 1868. It has been said also that the present Attorney-General was clearly of the opinion that there was no such power. And thus the argument was left as if no one entertained a contrary opinion. Now, for the purpose of showing that some person did entertain such contrary opinion, and that at least there was something to sustain the view that was taken by the minority, I referred very briefly to what was said by the then Chief Justice on this subject. I did not undertake to read the entire opinion, because I did not have it before me. I undertook to read what he said upon this subject as to the maximum of the greenback circulation.

Mr. BAYARD. At that time?

Mr. WRIGHT. At that time.

Mr. BAYARD. That was in 1863.

Mr. WRIGHT. At that time he said that, under the law of 1862, and the subsequent act of 1863, taking those two laws together, they contemplated a permanent circulation, until the resumption of payments in coin, of $400,000,000.

Mr. BAYARD. I stated the case precisely. The Chief Justice was reciting the laws of 1862 and 1863.

Mr. WRIGHT. I certainly so understand it, and I will come to 1866 hereafter. Of course he did not undertake to decide anything more than I have thus referred to, and for the purposes of my argument it is not necessary that I should go beyond it. I say, however, that he did give a construction to those two statutes, so far as that language can be regarded as a construction; whether it is to be considered as a mere obiter or not I shall not stop to discuss, but I quoted his language, and on that there can be no doubt.

Following that is a question upon which I do not propose to enter at this time. Those who differ with the minority of the Finance Committee on this point insist that by subsequent legislation the power to issue up to four hundred millions was taken away. There is no pretense, in my judgment, that it was taken away in express terms, but they say it was taken away by implication. I maintain that the power to issue up to four hundred millions is given in express terms, and they must show that it is either taken away in express terms or by such necessary implication as to amount to the same thing. There is the very point of difference. I say the power was given in express terms to issue up to four hundred millions. I say it has never been taken away by express terms or by such necessary implication as to amount to the same thing, or anything like it. There is where I stand. I say that, according to the language of the Chief Justice, the maximum of circulation was four hundred millions by the acts of 1862 and 1863. By the subsequent act allowing a retirement, and then the still later act suspending such retirement, it is claimed that the power to issue up to four hundred millions was taken away by necessary implication. I say that that is not so; and it being once shown that the power to issue up to four hundred millions was given by express language of the law, those who insist that that power is taken away must not rest it upon implication or presumption, but must show a so-be-it.

Mr. BAYARD. Let us see about this question. None more important in my opinion can be discussed than whether the higher officers of the Republic are to be bound by its laws. I have stated before my sense of the danger of the assumption of power, and I wish to show that it was an assumption, an unwarranted assumption. Let us see what is the contemporaneous history of the resolution directing the retirement of the forty-four millions. On the 4th of December, 1865, the message of the President of the United States, with the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, was sent to Congress, and in that report of the Secretary the following language occurs:

> That the legal-tender acts were war measures, passed in a great emergency; that they should be regarded only as temporary; and that they ought not to remain in force a day longer than would be necessary to enable the people to prepare for a return to the gold standard; and that the work of retiring the notes which have been issued should be commenced without delay, and carefully and persistently continued until all are retired. * * * *
> It is the opinion of the Secretary, as has already been stated, that the process of contraction cannot be injuriously rapid, and that it will not be necessary to retire more than one hundred, or at most two hundred, millions of United States notes, in addition to the compound notes, before the desired result will be attained; but neither the amount of reduction nor the time that will be required to bring up the currency to the specie standard can now be estimated with any degree of accuracy. The thing to be done is to establish the policy of contraction.

Such was the recommendation of the Administration at that time. Congress received that message and that report, and in March, 1866, the following resolution was passed by a vote nearly unanimous; I think there were but six in the negative in the House of Representatives:

> That this House cordially concurs in the views of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the necessity of a contraction of the currency, with a view to as early a resumption of specie payments as the business interests of the country will permit; and we hereby pledge our co-operative action to this end as speedily as possible.

That resolution was passed March 15, 1866, by a vote of 144 to 6. On the 12th of April, 1866, the act for contraction was passed, providing—

> That of United States notes not more than $10,000,000 may be retired and canceled within six months from the passage of this act, and thereafter not more than $4,000,000 in any one month.

I do not think that it will be gainsaid, that it will be doubted, that the avowed object was to commence the contraction of the currency by retiring and canceling these notes until they all should be retired; that it was the avowed policy of Congress, declared by their resolutions and by their votes, that the Treasury notes of the United States issued as legal-tenders, being a mere war measure, should die in time of peace as soon as the business interests of the country would permit, and they proceeded to put a grade upon the progress of that retirement, which I have stated, in the law of April, 1866.

In 1868, in the month of January, as I said, the speculators of this country came in to stop this process of contraction, and Congress then passed a bill declaring—

> That from and after the passage of this act the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to make any reduction of the currency by retiring or canceling United States notes shall be, and hereby is, suspended.

In the name of common sense what is meant by a "reduction of the currency?" What is meant by "retiring or canceling notes," with the avowed purpose of putting them out of existence altogether? Talk about necessary intendment! Talk about implied repeals! The act of 1866 was as distinct a repeal of the maximum of $400,000,000, which had been spoken of by Chief Justice Chase as fixed in 1863, as any words in the English language would permit. It is no question of doubt. It is no question of mere inference. You either must take from the words all meaning, all natural meaning, all essential meaning, or you must admit the fact that the later law repeals pro tanto the legislation on the same subject that preceded it. As I said before, these were acts in pari materia; they are to be construed together; they relate to the same subject, and the later the law of course the stronger the authority. As I said before, it did not enter into the brain of the Secretary of the Treasury when he made his first lawless issue of these retired and canceled notes in 1862 that he had law for it. He merely said he did it, to use his own phrase, "upon grounds of public policy;" and the $5,000,000 were strictly recalled; they did not remain out; they were not suffered to remain out. When Congress met they had been replaced in the Treasury, and the thing was not attempted again until the still greater exigency of the fall of 1873 arrived.

So, Mr. President, I think it will be impossible for any candid man, layman or lawyer, who will read the legislation on this subject, not to feel that in the issue of $5,000,000 of these retired and canceled notes in 1872 by Mr. BOUTWELL, or the issue of $28,000,000 by Mr. Richardson, there was a gross, flagrant violation of the law, of a most dangerous character to the business interests of this country; and, it seems to me gentlemen of either party must be blind to its dangerous results if they do not arrest a principle which will destroy any government, and most of all a government which is intended to be, like ours, a government of laws.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I have often heard the present Secretary of the Treasury and his predecessor visited with somewhat harsh language touching the issue of what is now called the $44,000,000 reserve. I never before took occasion to interpose a word in behalf of either of those officers. And by as much as I did not, I have felt in some sense guilty on every occasion. I have had that feeling, because when the act alleged to have been violated by the Secretary of the Treasury was under consideration, it seemed to me, and not to me alone, but to better lawyers, that the act would give to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to do precisely what he has done and what the honorable Senator from Delaware now indulges himself in characterizing as the lawless act of issuing the greenbacks called in in 1872.

The Senator from Delaware also said, I think, in substance, that no layman and no lawyer could doubt, if I understood him——

Mr. BAYARD. In my opinion.

Mr. CONKLING. Of course; I assume it all rested in the opinion of the Senator—could, in his opinion, doubt that the Secretary of the Treasury had flatly violated the law in this regard. Now, Mr. President, if I happen to fall within either of the classes mentioned by the Senator, if I am either lawyer or layman, I wish to say that I am an exception to that universality, which, in the opinion of the Senator, would measure the conviction that the Secretary of the Treasury is to be blamed as matter of law, blamed for usurpation, not for bad finance, in the issue of some portion of the $44,000,000 reserve.

It would be strange indeed, Mr. President, if I should claim classification with the lawyers and the laymen to whom the Senator from Delaware refers, because I should be estopped in morals, if not in law, from enjoying a place in such numerous fellowship. Although I have had no opportunity since I succeeded in getting hold of the volume of the Globe before me to look at the whole of the debate, I find upon a single page at which I first opened it enough, I think, to answer the assertion of the Senator, that nobody supposed that this power would exist under the act as it was adopted. I find that I ventured myself to point out the latitude which would be left to the Secretary, the authority that he might well suppose he had to exert this very power. I offered an amendment—insisted upon it—to shut the door against this power, contending, that if we meant that there should be no after ncrease of the currency, we should say it; that if we chose only to say it should not be reduced, inasmuch as reduction does not mean increase, it might be held that, having specified that, we had not also intended to include the contrary; and so it appears upon the record that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] moved—

> To amend the amendment in the mode I suggested yesterday, by striking out in lines 13 and 14 the words "until Congress shall otherwise provide," and inserting "and the amount of such notes now existing shall not be further reduced until Congress shall otherwise provide."
> Mr. CONKLING. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "reduced," and before the word "until," the words "or increased;" so that it will read, "shall not be further reduced or increased until Congress shall otherwise provide."
> The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not strictly in order at this time.

I omit what followed as to that, for it turned out it was an amendment in the third degree which I had proposed. Again:

> The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.
> The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.
> Mr. CONKLING. Now I move my amendment to the amendment, to insert after the word "reduced," the words, "or increased."
> Mr. SUMNER. I would suggest to the Senator from New York another word as equivalent for the two—the word "changed."
> Mr. CONKLING. I have no objection.
> Mr. SHERMAN. That would subject it to the objection I have already made as to the right to destroy defaced and mutilated notes.
> Mr. CONKLING. I think there can be no such criticism on my amendment as it stands. I think the question had better be taken on the amendment as I offered it. The suggestion of the Senator from Ohio is that if I accept the proposition of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, I involve myself in the criticism that it might interfere with canceling defaced and mutilated notes and substituting other notes for them. Of course my amendment does not mean that.—Congressional Globe, Fortieth Congress, second session, part 1, page 523.

Mr. President, although I am not able to lay my hand at this moment upon what I know there is here, namely, a more extended explanation of the object of that amendment, I read enough to show that this did not pass by lawyers and laymen on that day; no man supposing that it left a door open for the doing, and the doing legally, of the very thing which is now characterized as lawless. I might find here that Senators beside myself predicted that exigencies would arise inviting the exercise of this power; and that upon the bill as it was proposed, and as it was left, the power would reside with the Secretary of the Treasury to do all that has since been done.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator from New York allow me to remind him of the point made by the Senator from Vermont? The Senator from Vermont insisted that there was doubt about the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue the $44,000,000 reserve, and maintained, I think, that the Secretary would have the power to issue the $44,000,000 at any time, or cancel it, unless we expressly prohibited his doing it; and that question was the point in the debate—that was the question disputed; the Senator from Oregon, (Mr. Williams,) the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] and myself insisting that without that amendment he could have no such power, and therefore any amendment was totally unnecessary, confirming the compact proposition that I made awhile ago, that not a single member of the Senate, when this question was under discussion, desired that this power should be conferred upon the Secretary. Some seventeen Senators, however, in order to guard against a conclusion, voted for expressly excluding that power. The majority of the Senate, deeming that immaterial and unnecessary, voted against the amendment simply because it was unnecessary, and every Senator who voted that way put his vote upon that ground.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not understand that the Senator from Ohio in his memory differs at all from mine. Let me state as I understand—and I think it will result as his understanding is—what took place in the debate. It was said on the one hand that the measure then pending, with the words that no further reduction should take place, would of itself operate in exclusion or prohibition of the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to emit under any name or by any mode afterward the legal-tenders, so called, which had been called in. On the other hand, as the Senator from Ohio observes, it was contended that to accomplish that exclusion a positive prohibition was necessary, and this record will show, although at this moment I speak from memory, not having traversed it—I say confidently that this record will show that it was not only contended that in the absence of an express prohibition the Secretary would have that power, but the mode in which he would derive it was pointed out, and the prediction was recorded that the very contingency would arise which has since confronted us. I think I might go further in my recollection of the debate. I think it will show an admission by Senators here, and by one not now here whose remarks I think I remember specia ly—that they shrank from a provision which in any contingency, however dire, would prevent the Secretary from using the greenbacks thus to be called in. But I speak of that with less confidence than I do upon the other point. I cannot be mistaken in my memory that it was contended by the Senator from Vermont now absent, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] by myself, and by other Senators, that nothing short of something which the Senate refused to ingraft upon the bill would close the door against the issue of the $44,000,000.

I am not, Mr. President, upon the question whether it was wise or otherwise, financially, to employ a portion of the $44,000,000 with which to buy bonds from those who took the currency and put it in their safes, in savings-banks, and hoarded it otherwise. I am not even upon the question whether the judgment of the Secretary was wise or otherwise as to the true intent and meaning of these statutes. I have an impression about that; but it is beside the present purpose. I am answering the remark made by the Senator from Delaware, and often made here, that the act of the Treasury was an infraction of law so gross, a usurpation so bald by the minister of finance, that neither lawyer nor layman could hesitate to condemn the flagrant outrage which was there committed. I say, Mr. President, that in my judgment such an observation is unjust and unwarranted in itself. It is perhaps most out of place in that body where warning was given that this very interpretation might be put upon the act, and where amendment after amendment was voted down to which no objection under heaven could be assigned, except that it was unnecessary, which amendments were offered for the very purpose of pre venting that interpretation which this act has since received.

I remember that the Senator from Maine no longer here, who was then my next-door neighbor, (Mr. Fessenden,) favored the amendment which I offered, saying that it would at least have the effect to correct the public judgment, that this might be done, and many Senators—the proportion in which the Senate divided I do not remember, but a large number of Senators—held that for some reason an amendment, such as was offered, was necessary as a safeguard and precaution. I think that fact alone, as attested by the record, would go far to show that there could be little ground for the assertion that an infraction of law has occurred so flagrant that nobody can doubt that it was a blamable violation of law. I doubt it, Mr. President, and I am willing to put myself thus far upon the record that as matter of law, pure and simple, the Secretary of the Treasury had a firm foundation under his feet when he considered and construed that statute as he did; and further, that if he looked at contemporaneous history, at the parliamentary proceeding by which it was ushered in, he had firm foundation under his feet, if he believed that a large portion of this body supposed that an amendment was necessary in order to deprive him of that power; and that, so believing, a majority of the Senate was nevertheless found to refuse more than once to import the amendment into the bill, there being no objection assigned to it, that I remember, by any Senator, save that it was unnecessary. The Senator from Indiana, I remember, did contend that it was unnecessary. The Senator from Ohio contended that it was unnecessary. They were answered, "Very well, then it will do no harm; let us make assurance double sure." Now, I say that, looking to that fact, beyond the reading of the text of the statute itself, my judgment is that no Secretary or administrative officer ought to be denounced for the construction put upon this, as if he had been guilty of some bold and guilty usurpation.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I have but a word to say; I will not detain the Senate. I made the remark that, in my opinion, from the contemporaneous legislation on this subject, the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, the resolutions of Congress, the acts of Congress, the votes of Congress, neither lawyer nor layman could doubt what was the intent and the result of the law of Congress in respect to this contraction of the currency; and that the $44,000,000 retired and canceled by the Secretary of the Treasury between April, 1866, and January, 1868, was intended to be a permanent retirement of that fund; and that the reissue of it without further warrant of Congress was an act of usurpation and not based upon law. That opinion I still retain, although we have heard the Senator from New York, with his usual ability, contend for the contrary. I did not say that there could be no opinion to the contrary, much less would I undertake to measure the force of that Senator in any opinion he might see fit in the premises to maintain. I have heard his opinions given too often not to know to what extent they may go where he desires to force them. In this case he has expressed his opinion, and I am perfectly willing to leave it, his own expressed ably as it was, and mine as feebly as it was, to the Senate and to the country. I do not think he can destroy the plain meaning of plain words, or that he can make the people of this country believe that it not only was not the intent of Congress to do that which by plain words they professed their intent to do, but he has intimated (and I scarcely think that his friends will thank him for the defense) that the gentlemen who refused to vote for the further provision relating to the increase did it with the intent that the increase should take place in the face of the language which had been used.

"Save me from my friends," Mr. President, if such a construction is to be placed upon the action of Senators who said that there was no use in putting in this amendment, because the other language was clear enough, explicit enough; that behind it there lurked the intent to give that law an effect by authorizing an expansion of the currency which those who desired it had not the manhood and the honesty to declare to the American people. Sir, I do not believe it to have been the intent of any gentleman, that under cover of such legislation as that of 1866 and 1868 there should be an increase of the volume of the currency of the country. Until I shall see it, I shall think the Senator must have been mistaken in his recollection, and that no such intent could have existed in the mind of any Senator when he voted for the law of 1866 and of 1868 as by the omission of the word "increase" to destroy the meaning of the words "diminish," and "retire," and "cancel," or, to use the exact phrase of the law, that thereby the meaning of the word "reduction" was destroyed. When you use the word "reduction," do you mean in any way to imply an increase? Is it not far-fetched, is it not unreasonable? Would any court of justice hear it or entertain it with respect for one instant that, when a man is told to reduce his debt, and you do not say he shall not increase his debt, he shall have the implied power to increase his debt? That is the case here; the sum and substance of the argument we have heard from the honorable Senator from New York. I cannot conceive, on the intelligence and honor of the men who voted for that law, that they could have intended, by refusing to adopt the amendment the Senator has spoken of, to allow that law to contain a power obscured by its words, and purposely obscured, which was intended at some time to be sprung upon the people, a power than which none more dangerous can be imagined by me— the power to inflate or diminish the volume of the currency of this country at will reposed in a single man. Yet that would have been the precise result which would be reached if the construction the Senator offers is true. I cannot believe that such was the intent of those Senators who voted against the amendment of the Senator from New York. They did believe it unnecessary, because they believed, as I do to-day, that the language of the laws which they were considering excluded every other conclusion than that the contraction of the volume of the currency, the necessary, the essential step to a return to specie payments, was what was intended at the time the diminution of volume was authorized by the act of 1866 and arrested by the act of 1868. I do not consider that the construction of the honorable Senator from New York is at all justified by the language of the act or the action of Congress. Of course I do not mean to speak of what his private information may be or his own motive on this subject, but I can speak of the record as we have it, the vote as we have it, and the language of the bill we acted upon.

Mr. CONKLING. I think the Senator from Delaware has been successful in answering nothing so well as the point he imputes to me, inventing it wholly himself.

Mr. BAYARD. What is that?

Mr. CONKLING. It is the suggestion that I intimated in some form that somebody voted with some hidden purpose or with a view for accomplishing something by it which was not to appear upon its face.

Mr. BAYARD. Did not the Senator state that members of the Senate shrank——

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will pardon me, I am in the act of stating the only thing which fell from me, and to which his remark can possibly apply. I said I thought the debate would show an admission by Senators that they shrank from legislation which would in all circumstances tie the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury in that respect. Now, if the Senator can find in that any intimation that there was anything secret, or private, or hidden, or diabolical, I do not see where it is to be found. My suggestion was that this debate, as it stands coldly recorded in the Globe, would show expressions or admissions, by implication or otherwise, by members of the Senate that they thought it would not be wise to have an enactment so cast-iron as the Senator declares he believes this to be. That is all; and I beg to assure the Senator that I have no private information about it, and there is nothing about it, public or private, in that regard beyond the statement I first made and have now repeated.

Now, Mr. President, unless the Senator wants to make some further observation, in which case I yield to him——

Mr. BAYARD. I merely want to reply to what the Senator was saying, that I suggested a point and answered it myself. It seems now the Senator did say that certain members of the Senate shrank from casting a vote in favor of an amendment lest they might lose the benefit which they believed lurked in the law of an increase of the volume of the currency, which if it existed was given in such obscure terms that nobody could imagine it, and which the large majority of the Senate declared could not be held at all to exist. The point that I made was simply a reply to the Senator's own suggestion, that somebody shrank. Why did they shrink? What do men shrink from? Way should they shrink? It was a plain proposition; they were voting on a plain law in regard to a high public duty. I see no reason why gentlemen should shrink and not give cause for shrinking; and yet I certainly understood the honorable Senator to say that there were motives which withheld the votes of Senators in favor of that amendment, because they did intend that the law should contain the possibility of a further expansion. That is what I understood him to say. In his first statement I may have misunderstood his point, but I think now, after I have heard his words again, that they are entirely as I stated them.

Mr. CONKLING. There is one point on which the Senator from Delaware might have criticised me. He has not done so, and I will do it myself; that is, rising to review a record without having looked at it sufficiently to be able when I rose to refer to matters to which my recollection related. While the Senator has been on his feet I have been looking to see whether the record would fortify me in my recollection or not; and I call attention to a few matters which I find in the debate.

The amendment having been offered, it was suggested that it was unnecessary. Thereupon we find the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] expressing himself thus:

He—

does not tell us that it is intended, and I take it that he does not intend this bill as containing an implied authority to expand from the $356,000,000 up to the $400,000,000.

His answer, on the contrary, is, that as he understands the law there is no authority in the Secretary of the Treasury to increase the present outstanding amount of $356,000,000 up to the $400,000,000, which was the original limit. Upon that we differ. He supposes the law to be as he states, that there is no such power. I believe the law to confer upon the Secretary of the Treasury the power of going up to the $400,000,000 by reissue, not of the same notes, they, as my friend from Oregon said, being destroyed; but if he had attended the meetings of the committee that we are both members of—which is trying to find out what has become of the money printed at the Treasury Department and at New York—as often as I have, to see the printing going on of United States legal-tenders, he would see that they are coming over by express loads all the time; that the fact that a particular note is destroyed does not prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from having plenty of other notes just like it, and issuing new notes, so that the fact of destruction does not touch the matter at all.

Again:

I said that other persons besides myself understood the law to be what I have stated—that the Secretary of the Treasury has power to reissue up to the limit, just as a bank has up to its chartered limits, the funds which are put into its hands for the purpose of business. There has been put into my hand by my friend——

Then follows a citation which I omit, and proceed to this:

Then, if it is not necessary, Mr. President, inasmuch as it is a question about which we do not agree whether the power exists or not, if we do not want the Secretary to have the power, is it not better to make it certain by putting on this limitation upon his power of expansion? The Senator from Ohio says the law is so now. Very well; I wish it were; I hope he is right; but I fear and believe that the law is not so now. If we both agree that the law ought to be as he says it is, then let us agree to this amendment so far as going up to the $400,000,000 is concerned, and that will put an end to the question.

I am surprised to hear Senators object to the amendment so strenuously and so stoutly, merely because they say, upon a disputed point in the law, that it is unnecessary in order to make the law clear. Did we not know their frankness and candor, it would lead us to believe that there is something in the dark about this—something that is kept back.—Congressional Globe, Fortieth Congress, second session, 1867-'68, part 1, page 437.

I pass from that, and turn over to a remark made by the then Senator from Missouri, (Mr. Henderson,) who was no slouch in the apprehension of statutes or in statutory construction, but a very clear-headed man, as I think the Senator from Delaware will agree with me. See what he says; and I have not been able to follow this to select the strong passages; but Mr. EDMUNDS, on a subsequent day, pursuing this same idea, remarks:

Now I will endeavor to convince my friend from Ohio that taking these acts together—

The very acts to which the Senator from Delaware has been referring—the Secretary has that power—

That is, the power to reissue.

I hope he has not.

Mr. HENDERSON. No doubt he has the power.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am addressing myself to the Senator from Ohio, who holds that he has not the power. My friend from Missouri says there is no doubt that he has the power. I should be glad to agree with the Senator from Ohio, but I have no doubt that he has the unquestionable power to carry the whole amount of outstanding United States notes up to $400,000,000, and the power to carry it to $450,000,000 under the authority to issue the $50,000,000 reserve to take up temporary loans. As my friend, the chairman of the committee, has invited anybody who believes the law now authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to carry up these notes to $450,000,000 to show it, I proceed to do so.—Congressional Globe, Fortieth Congress, second session, 1867–'68, part 1, page 529.

And then follows a long analysis of these statutes.

Now, Mr. President, I beg to take myself out of this discussion because in the mean time I have found ampler and better authority; and I submit to the Senate, I would submit to the candor of all fair men, that if it stood alone upon the unqualified asseveration of the Senator from Vermont, and the equally unqualified asseveration of the Senator from Missouri, then not only a lawyer but a member of the Committee on Finance—I am not mistaken about that?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Henderson was at one time a member of the Committee on Finance. I do not know whether he was or not at that particular time.

Mr. SCOTT. He states in the debate that he was a member of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONKLING. My honorable friend from Pennsylvania says that he states himself, in the debate, that he was a member of that committee. Certainly that is my recollection. I complete my statement by saying that if this enactment in its true intent and meaning stood upon the exposition given it by these two Senators alone, supplemented by the record showing that the Senate refused to close the door against the construction since given it, no man, be he Senator or otherwise, could in justice—and I do not think the Senator from Delaware means to be unjust—no man in justice could denounce a minister of finance or any other administrative or judicial officer who, laying his hand upon all those statutes, said "I hold that the power does remain with the Secretary of the Treasury to carry the total issue up to $400,000,000."

My purpose, I say again, Mr. President, is all the time merely to vindicate from what I conceive to be unjust aspersion officers whom I believe incapable of intentional wrong; and in my judgment they need no vindication past this record, which I think needs only to be held up in order to convince any man unbiased by prejudice that there is no room here for imputing bad intention or even stupidity to these officers, however casuists or jurists might differ upon a question of law.

I see the honorable Senator from Delaware about to rise to disclaim that he has imputed either bad intent or stupidity to these officers. I do not wish to do him injustice, and I will not assume that that was his intention; but when he declared, as I understood him to declare, that his position was so clear that no man of intelligence, either lawyer or layman, could doubt it, it seemed to me that he placed both of these officers within very narrow confines, and I know not how they are to be defended unless it is by acquitting them of being fools, by convicting them of being knaves, or else by acquitting them of being knaves, by convicting them of being fools; for if they have done on their oaths that which so baldly if not so wantonly violates the law that no lawyer or layman of intelligence can contemplate it and doubt that they have fallen into an utter error, it seems to me that they have approached almost the extremity I have supposed.

Now, Mr. President, I had no design for several reasons of joining to-day in this debate. I rose merely to do an act of justice, and without having had as I should have had, and as I have not yet had this record before me, to the end that I might select and assemble those passages of the debate which, much beyond the particular ones to which I have referred, would have answered the purpose that brought me to my feet.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish, in connection with the statement made by my friend from New York, to again state that I have had occasion recently to look over this whole record, and I find that the entire debate turned on the question whether or not it was necessary, by an express provision of law, to deny the power to the Secretary to reissue the $44,000,000. That was debated here for a day or two by lawyers on both sides. I am not able at this moment to turn to the actual vote, but I know that it was quite large. When the question before the Senate was, has the Secretary of the Treasury the power to issue $44,000,000 over and above the $356,000,000? those who affirmed that power, or who feared that he might have it and were opposed to its exercise, following the lead of the Senator from Vermont, did insist that at least there was a doubt on that subject, and some of them expressed the opinion in the heat of the argument that he would have that power if no express provision of law was made excluding it. On the other hand, a very large majority of the Senate held the contrary opinion, and stated in arguments of considerable force and ability that the power could not be claimed anywhere; and appeals were made all through the debate to Senators to point out the law under which this power could be claimed. Gentlemen were asked to indicate the authority of law under which the power could be claimed by the Secretary of the Treasury to issue the $44,000,000 notes retired and canceled. After the Senator from Vermont was through, and after a number of persons had participated in the argument, I find that I said:

I am not in favor of issuing any more United States notes, but the objection that I have to this amendment is that it introduces another phase of our financial problem into this bill, and involves a sending of it back to the other House again to create debate and contention. Now I think Senators ought to be willing to let the thing stand as it is at present. * * * * * *

If I thought there was any doubt on this point, or any probability that the Secretary of the Treasury would, under the authority of the law we are about to pass, issue notes in the place of those canceled, I would agree that it ought to be prevented; but we know that it is an impossible thing; we know it is not contemplated by the Secretary.—Congressional Globe, second session Fortieth Congress, part 1, page 530.

The whole purpose of this law was plain and manifest. The policy of contraction had been adopted by a vote of both Houses of Congress. Both Houses of Congress had declared that it was the duty of Congress to reduce the volume of currency. We declared by an act that the Secretary of the Treasury might "retire and cancel" the currency, the very words we used in regard to bonds. When he paid off a bond he retired and canceled it. We limited his authority to retire and cancel the notes of the United States to $4,000,000 a month. He proceeded to retire and cancel them at that rate until the limit was reached of $356,000,000. Thus the purpose of Congress was simply to prevent further contraction; not to reissue what had been canceled and destroyed, but to prevent any further contraction of the currency; and the law of 1868 was introduced and passed declaring that for the present the power to contract the currency should be suspended until further action by Congress.

I say, again, that at the time that bill was under discussion in the Senate, although some Senators claimed that there might be a doubt and some even that he would have the power to go up to the old limit of four hundred millions, yet no Senator contemplated the idea of the exercise of such a power. While some insisted that it might be done, no one looked upon it as a desirable thing to be done, as a thing which it was contemplated would be done. The Secretary was known to be opposed to it. The Secretary of the Treasury was in favor of contraction; and perhaps the very fact that the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McCulloch, was known to be utterly opposed to any expansion, might have induced many of us to vote against the amendment which was offered only as a precaution.

Sir, if it had been supposed that the power to issue $44,000,000 had been reserved in the language of the old laws cited by the Senator from Vermont, there can be no question whatever that, by a unanimous vote I may say, the power to issue the $44,000,000 reserve would have been cut off; there can be no doubt about that. But we did not desire to add amendments to the bill which would send it back to the House of Representatives and continue a contest that had been going on for some time, because this debate in the Senate was continued for certainly several days. The friends of that bill who desired to stop the contraction of the currency according to the policy of Mr. McCulloch, did not want to send the bill back to the House, and were therefore opposed to the amendment. In the light of the facts that have since occurred, in the light of the history of our times, I am very sorry indeed, and I express my regret that I did not follow the lead of the Senator from Vermont, and vote for his amendment limiting the power. Then all the controversy in which we are now involved would have been avoided, and the gradual reduction of the currency which occurred up to 1868 would have been maintained, and we should have no controversy about the issue of the $44,000,000. It is over, however. I do not debate it now, because I think the question is not a practical one before us. I merely recall the attention of the Senate to the history of this matter.

To-morrow I propose to explain the general features of the proposition submitted by the Committee on Finance to-day, as briefly as possible; and I do not intend to be drawn or dragged into any discussion of the $44,000,000, because it is past and gone. The Secretary of the Treasury, according to the unanimous opinion of the Committee on Finance, exercised what he believed was a legal power. We all agreed that it was a question of doubt; at any rate the power was exercised under extraordinary circumstances, and we had no doubt that not only the present Secretary but the preceding Secretary believed he was exercising a power that was conferred on him by law. He exercised it under circumstances of great pressure which, if anything in the world could justify the exercise of such a doubtful power, would do so; and the purpose of the committee was not to reprove him, but simply to assert our construction of the law, upon which I have never had any doubt. Twenty-six million dollars of this $44,000,000 is now outstanding, and we must act upon the statu quo, the condition of things that exists to-day, and on the assumption that that money is lawfully in circulation among our people, and base our measures upon that. I therefore do not regard this discussion of the $44,000,000 reserve at all material now, except as a matter of legal power which I will not discuss any further.

Mr. President, the question as to the mode in which the business that is before us shall be further conducted is one that I hope the Senate will fix upon to-night. The bill pending before us is a bill to transfer twenty-five millions of bank-note circulation from the East to the West. That bill, reported from the Committee on Finance, as a matter of course, at the proper time will be open to amendment. It is not now open to amendment, because there is a motion to refer pending. I take it that no member of the Senate will now desire to have the bill referred to the Committee on Finance. There is no occasion for that. The Committee on Finance, after careful consideration, have reported a proposition which they intend to present as a substitute. Now, the question with me is whether it is not better to have the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUCKINGHAM] withdraw his motion to refer, and that, as a matter of course, is the end of it, and then the bill will be open to amendment; and I will then offer the bill that lies on your table, which was reported to-day, as a substitute. Perhaps it is better in the consideration of so important a measure that the substitute offered should be considered, not in the light of an amendment, but as the principal text of the bill. It will then be more logical and more parliamentary to offer amendment to it. If I offer it as an amendment to the bill now pending, it will only be open to amendment in the first degree, while if it is taken up by unanimous consent, a very common process here, as the text of the bill, it will then be open to amendment in the second degree.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair ventures to suggest to the Senator that perhaps the more direct and easy way would be to take up to-night his new bill and let it be placed in a position for consideration to-morrow, and then it will stand as the original bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose I can move to make it the special order for to-morrow in lieu of the pending bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Connecticut can only be withdrawn by unanimous consent, it having been amended by the addition of instructions.

Mr. SHERMAN. In order to settle the matter, and begin at it in the best way—and I do not want to take this mode if any Senator objects, because I do not want to make a controversy about the order of business now—I move to take up the bill reported to-day by the Committee on Finance, laying the present bill on the table. At the same time, if Senators think it better to go on with the bill as it is, I have no objection.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. It seems to me that that would hardly be just to Senators who have advocated the immediate increase of the currency. I have in my mind certain Senators who are in favor of a direct increase, and yet who are not perhaps in favor of a free-banking system. It seems to me, if the new bill should be taken up and the other set aside, it would preclude their right to express themselves unless by an amendment to the new bill. We have occupied so much time in this discussion right in the line of this proposed increase that, having taken the vote on the question of free banking, and that having been voted down at the time, and this inserted in its place by a majority of 3, it strikes me that the mode of action now suggested would be hardly just to those Senators who believe the process should be in the way of a direct increase rather than under the free-banking system.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill reported to-day presents every question that can come up on the subject.

Mr. SCHURZ. Let me suggest to the Senator from Michigan that he does not gain anything at all. We are now discussing the reference of the bill to the committee with instructions. Suppose he should carry his point, then the bill would simply be referred to the committee with instructions, and the committee would have to report afterward.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. But suppose the Senate should not refer it, what then?

Mr. SCHURZ. Then he would have to make amendments to the original bill, and he could make those amendments just as well to the bill now introduced by the Senator from Ohio as to the original bill.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I understand, if the Senate refuses to recommit this bill to the Committee on Finance, it then stands open to amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The question then recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT,] and the Senate would vote upon that. If that was rejected or adopted, then the question would come upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] as a substitute, and the bill would still be open to amendment. They are separate propositions.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the use of keeping before the Senate a bill about the $25,000,000 of transferred bank currency? The Senator from Michigan knows very well that we introduced that bill to draw out the views of the Senate, and now we have gone on and matured a bill which stands as a substitute for all, which repeals the very law proposed to be executed in the bill now pending, and presents all these questions. The most logical and best way, it seems to me, for the Senate is to take up the bill that presents practically all the questions that can be settled at once by the action of the Senate.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. As I understand the question, if the Senate refuses to recommit this bill, the proposition then is upon the pending amendment. Now the chairman of the Committee on Finance proposes the last bill reported by the committee as a substitute for the pending bill. Therefore the question will first occur upon improving the text.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator misunderstands me. At the suggestion of some one I proposed to lay the present bill and pending amendments on the table, and take up directly the bill reported to-day. It presents every question involved. Then that bill will be open to amendment in a double degree, so that the Senator can offer any amendment he desires.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask the Senator what he gains by that?

Mr. SHERMAN. We save the consumption of time; that is all.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Perhaps I do not clearly comprehend the parliamentary situation; but it strikes me that there are two propositions before the Senate as presented by the report of the committee. One is the question of an increase of forty-six millions; the other is free banking. The proposition having been so long before the Senate for a direct increase, and having been carried by a majority of 3, it would hardly be just to that majority to now propose to lay aside that idea and to take up a bill which does not involve a direct increase, but an indirect one, under the free-banking system. I know Senators who are in favor of direct increase and are opposed to free banking.

Mr. SHERMAN. This new bill fixes the amount of United States notes at $382,000,000. The very moment the bill is taken up the Senator can move to raise it to four hundred millions.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I understand that; but now on the pending bill we have the question of a direct increase of the bank currency.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is in the same bill.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. But it is under free banking in the Senator's new bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. You can move to amend it in any way. You can offer a substitute. In order to test the sense of the Senate, I submit the motion that the present bill be postponed with a view to take up Senate bill No. 617, reported to-day.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not presume that there is any advantage gained by any parliamentary tactics in this case. But where a battle has been fought on a certain line and on a certain proposition, for a majority of the Senate to turn right around and lay that down, and take up a minority proposition, is not a fair mode of warfare. I am opposed to the course now proposed. I am willing that the Finance Committee's bill reported to-day may take its chances the same as any other bill; but I do not propose to give it any advantages. It is not a free-banking bill at all. It does not propose free banking, although it has been so stated. It proposes no such thing. There is no such thing in it. It is free banking to a portion of the country, and an exclusion to the other. It is not free banking at all.

Now we have three propositions before the Senate; and they have been voted on. One of them has been carried in the Senate by a majority. The proposition of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] has been voted upon and decided. The question then remaining was whether or not that proposition should be referred back to the committee with instructions, on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut; and that is the pending motion now before the Senate, and has been since the time the vote was taken some weeks ago. Now I suggest that the matter stand before the Senate as it is. If the Senator from Connecticut will withdraw his motion for a reference, then the propositions will all stand as they were before that motion was made. Then the Senator from Ohio can propose his bill as an amendment or substitute, and it will then be a question for the Senate to say whether they will accept the proposition of the chairman of the Committee on Finance as a substitute or amendment to these propositions.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me stop the Senator a moment. I have no objection to that plan except one; and I state frankly to the Senator that was the course I intended to pursue, but it prevents Senators having the advantage of offering amendments in the second degree. For instance, if I take the advice of the Senator from Illinois as to the course I shall pursue, any one offering an amendment to this proposition of the committee, which would itself be an amendment, would be limited to the first degree; and the Senator has been long enough in parliamentary life to know that that is sometimes extremely inconvenient for the body itself.

Mr. LOGAN. I know it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is inconvenient in getting at the sense of the Senate. But as I said before, I am willing to do that if it is thought to be best.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator proposes his bill as a substitute, and the Senate should adopt it as a substitute, it would then be open to amendment, would it not?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; that is the very trouble.

Mr. LOGAN. Is that the rule of the Senate?

Mr. SHERMAN. If this amendment is offered as a substitute, and is adopted, you cannot then strike out a word of it. That is the parliamentary law.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. I am willing to agree to that; and if the Senate has a mind to adopt it as a substitute, and thereby declare that it is the sense of the Senate, I have no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is open to amendment in the first degree only.

Mr. LOGAN. I asked if it was not open to amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. I said in the first degree. But if once adopted as an amendment to the original bill, then it cannot be amended.

Mr. LOGAN. I am willing, as far as I am individually concerned, to take the chances of its being adopted. As one occupying a different position from the Senator who is chairman of the Committee on Finance, having acted with the Senators who have adopted these propositions before, I am not willing to concede any such thing as is now asked for the purpose of allowing this new bill to take the place of the one before us. In my judgment, after reading this bill, it is just as easy to amend the proposition before the Senate without this bill and make it in accordance with the view of the Senate, as it is to amend this bill in accordance with the views of the Senate.

Mr. CRAGIN. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to a fact to see if I am right?

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. CRAGIN. As I understand, the motion now pending is the motion of the Senator from Connecticut to recommit this bill. That motion has been amended by the motion of the Senator from North Carolina, instructing the committee. Now, if the motion of the Senator from Connecticut prevails, that carries the bill to the committee. If it does not prevail, then does not the motion of the Senator from North Carolina fall with it? It was an amendment to his motion.

Mr. LOGAN. Not if the Senator withdraws his motion.

Mr. CRAGIN. He cannot withdrawit now, because an amendment has been made to it.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I have no authority to withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut cannot withdraw the motion without unanimous consent at this stage.

Mr. LOGAN. With the consent of the Senate he can withdraw his motion. It leaves the matter then with its status before the Senate the same as before. The motion of the Senator from North Carolina falls with the withdrawal of the motion to recommit. Then the question stands on the forty-six million increase as an amendment to the bill reported by the Finance Committee originally.

Mr. MERRIMON. The Senator is mistaken about that, if he will allow me. The matter stands before the Senate in this way: The Senator from Connecticut moved to refer, and thereupon I moved to instruct. My motion prevailed. The question now is on the motion to refer with those instructions.

Mr. LOGAN. So I understand.

Mr. MERRIMON. Suppose that is withdrawn by common consent, then the first question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT,] to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty." If that should be voted down, or even if that should be adopted, then the question is upon my substitute for the bill as it came from the committee; and the substitute that is offered for the bill is the substance of the instructions that were voted to the committee.

Mr. LOGAN. It makes no difference either way, leaving either question before the Senate. I was going to say that it is just as feasible to amend the proposition as it stands before the Senate by the views of the majority of the Senate as it is to amend this bill in accordance with the views of a majority of the Senate. There is no difference whatever. If this bill should be adopted as a substitute, as the chairman of the committee says, as the sense of the Senate, that is one thing. Whether it will be or not is, as a matter of course, a question for the Senate to determine by their vote.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I rise to a question of order. It is now not yet one o'clock; and I submit that no other business can go on during the morning hour until the second call of States has progressed so far as the time may allow.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman's point is not well taken. The rule on the subject will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Except during the last ten days of the session the Speaker shall not entertain a motion to suspend the rules of the House at any time, except on Monday of every week, at the expiration of one hour after the Journal is read, unless the call of the States and Territories for bills on leave has been earlier concluded, when the Speaker may entertain a motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this rule very specific

Mr. MELLISH. I would like to introduce a bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, if there be no objection, will recognize for the introduction of bills gentlemen who were not present when their States were called; but the Chair gives notice that after the States and Territories have been called through, if any gentleman insists on his right to the floor for the presentation of a motion to suspend the rules, the reference of bills is, after that, a matter of sufferance and unanimous consent. The House meets at twelve o'clock, and the presumption is that members are in their seats—which is a violent presumption sometimes. [Laughter.]

POST-OFFICES IN CITIES.

Mr. MELLISH introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2643) in relation to rates of postage between two or more post-offices within the corporate limits of any city; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAYS. I ask leave to introduce a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to prevent cruelty to animals while in transit by railroad or other means of transportation in the United States," approved March 3, 1873. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Agriculture, and that it be ordered to be printed.

Mr. NEGLEY. That bill should not be referred to the Committee on Agriculture but to the Committee on Commerce, where it properly belongs. This refers to a matter of commerce and not of agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot allow any discussion in reference to the reference of a bill in the morning hour, because the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is on the floor to move the suspension of the rules.

Mr. NEGLEY. The bill should be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HAYS. It was before the Committee on Agriculture when the law now upon the statute-book was passed. It was considered by the Committee on Agriculture and reported from that committee. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. NEGLEY. I must object unless the bill goes to the Committee on Commerce. I raise the question on the reference of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be withdrawn for the present until after the morning hour.

WASHINGTON, CINCINNATI AND SAINT LOUIS RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, introduced a bill (H. R. ENFORCING THE ATTENDANCE OF WITNESSES.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee of the House on the Investigation into the Affairs of the District of Columbia, desires to introduce a bill on which he asks action at this time.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2649) to amend an act in relation to enforcing the attendance of witnesses before committees of either House of Congress, approved January 24, 1862; which was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read for information at this time.

The bill, which was read, provides that all the provisions of the act entitled "An act amending the provisions of the second section of the act of January 24, 1857, enforcing attendance of witnesses before committees of either House of Congress," approved January 24, 1862, shall be applicable to joint committees, both standing and select, of the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the bill simply makes the existing law in relation to the enforcing of attendance of witnesses before committees of either House applicable to the joint committees of the two Houses.

Mr. COX. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the present law does not require every case of contumacious witnesses to be reported to the House. Is it not so?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I am not prepared to answer that question at this time.

Mr. COX. Are we to understand this does not change the law in that regard?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. It does not.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection the bill will be considered at this time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXPENSES OF THE DISTRICT INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Appropriations, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 583) making an appropriation to defray the expenses of the Joint Select Committee to Inquire into the Affairs of the District of Columbia.

The question was on ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The bill appropriates the sum of $10,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of the Joint Select Committee to Inquire into the Affairs of the District of Columbia; and provides that that sum shall be drawn from the Treasury, upon the order of the Secretary of the Senate, as the same shall be required; and any portion of the amount appropriated that shall be allowed by the said joint committee to witnesses attending before it or persons employed in its service, for per diem, traveling, or other necessary expenses, and paid by the Secretary of the Senate, in pursuance of the orders of said joint committee, shall be accordingly credited and allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT BONDS AND FREE BANKING.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. I desire to move that the rules be suspended, and the preamble and resolution which I send to the desk adopted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is now on the floor to move a suspension of the rules.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. I hope the gentleman will yield to me.

Mr. DAWES. I will yield to anything that can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. I desire to have the resolution adopted under a suspension of the rules, which I have not asked before during this session.

The SPEAKER. The preamble and resolution will be read, after which objections, if any, to its present consideration, will be in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the present national banking system was established when Government bonds were sold for 40, 50, and 60 per cent. of their face value in gold, owing to the expenditures and uncertainties of the great civil war in which the nation was engaged at the time; and whereas it was then deemed necessary, in order to induce capitalists to sustain the credit of the Government, to make Government bonds drawing 6 per cent. interest in gold the securities of our national banks, while they were permitted to issue currency to represent 90 per cent. of the bonds deposited with the Government, thus drawing two profits from one capital, and thereby imposing a double burden upon the resources of the whole country; and whereas the exceptional and peculiar circumstances under which the nation then suffered no longer exist, our ability to maintain the Union and pay all of our obligations being no longer a matter of doubt, and our bonds which sold for from 40 to 60 per cent. of their face value in gold being now worth from 6 to 8 per cent. premium in gold and from 16 to 18 per cent. premium in currency, thus netting an enormous profit to the original holders; and whereas the banks which deposited these bonds with the Government have been large gainers by this increase in the value of their paid-up capital, while, besides the profits on their circulation, they have received an aggregate interest of over $20,000,000 a year in gold, or more than $30,000,000 a year in currency, and the privilege of monopolizing the banking business of the nation, a monopoly which each year becomes more injurious to the prosperity of the American people: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That it is the judgment of this House that the privilege of banking should be a source of profit and not of loss to the nation, and that the present national banking system should be so reorganized as to establish "free banks," based upon United States bonds as security for their circulation, and that interest shall be paid by the Government only on 10 per cent. of the face value of the bonds thus deposited, the interest on the remaining 90 per cent. of said bonds to go to the Government as a consideration for the privilege granted to the banks, which 90 per cent. of capital is to be represented by that amount of currency which the banks shall be privileged to issue.

Mr. HUBBELL. I must object.

AMOUNT OF LEGAL-TENDER NOTES.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1398) to fix the amount of legal-tender notes at $400,000,000, and that it be brought before the House for consideration at the present time.

I desire to state, as I stated to the House the other day, that it is my purpose to get a vote upon this bill, admitting amendments to it, that will reduce the amount below $400,000,000. I propose myself to offer an amendment reducing the amount to $356,000,000.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read. In its preamble it recites that the existing uncertainty as to whether the amount of legal-tender notes now authorized by law to be kept in general circulation is $356,000,000 or $400,000,000 is calculated to derange the business of the country and unsettle values. The bill therefore declares the provisions of law existing prior to the passage of the act approved April 12, 1866, entitled "An act to amend an act to provide ways and means to support the Government, approved March 3, 1865," to be in force, so as to authorize an amount of legal-tender notes of the United States to the amount of $400,000,000 to be kept in general circulation; and provides that the total amount of United States notes issued, or to be issued, shall never exceed $400,000,000.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] will have his amendment read also.

Mr. MAYNARD. I trust the gentleman from Massachusetts will not press this motion now. This question is involved in the general bill of the committee that has charge of the subject, and they have that bill assigned as a special order after the disposition of the transportation bill. I am assured by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] that he will endeavor to get the action of the House on the transportation bill to-morrow, which will bring up this subject for discussion immediately afterward; and my friend from Massachusetts will have an opportunity of discussing it, if not in his present seat, in a position in which his views will not be less acceptable. I trust that the matter may be postponed for the present.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts is that the rules be suspended, that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from further consideration of the bill, and that it be brought before the House for action.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to ask my colleague a question. In bringing this bill before the House for action, is he not going to allow any amendments?

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to bring the bill before the House and admit amendments that may reduce the amount below $400,000,000; but unless a majority of the House should order otherwise, which of course I could not control, not to admit any amendments that would make the amount over $400,000,000.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; I do not want to act or to vote in a strait-jacket. Of course no amendment could be sustained which the majority of the House did not concur in.

Mr. DAWES. I am acting under instructions from my committee. My colleague cannot be put into a strait-jacket by the recommendation of the committee, because if a majority of the House are in favor of making the amount more than $400,000,000 they can control the matter by voting down the previous question.

Mr. COX. I would like to hear the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts read, and I want to know what he intends to do with the reserve already out.

Mr. DAWES. The amendment which I propose to offer, if the House will permit me to read it, is this: to strike out all after the seventh line, and insert the following:

Be so far amended that hereafter the total amount of United States notes in circulation at any one time shall not exceed $356,000,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to withdraw from circulation and cancel whatever amount of such notes are now in circulation beyond that sum, as soon as the same can be done consistently with the exigencies of the Treasury.

My colleague on the committee from New York [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS] proposes to offer an amendment, which he will read.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I hold in my hand an amendment which I propose to offer.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know if the committee propose to introduce a bill which leaves the law exactly as it is claimed to be now and refuse to allow amendments other than those that have been indicated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state what he understands to be the purpose of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. If the motion to suspend the rules prevails, an amendment will be offered by him, and an amendment to that amendment will be offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS,] who is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] also indicates his desire to offer an amendment. The Chair will hear the amendment of the gentleman from New York read.

Mr. CONGER. Perhaps now would be a proper time for me to make my inquiry, and it is whether, under the rules, any other amendments than those provided for by this agreement can be offered to the bill?

The SPEAKER. Not if the House should second the demand for the previous question. It would be entirely within the competency of a majority of the House to refuse to second the previous question, in which case the bill will be left open for amendment.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. Would any amendment be in order excepting those which have been printed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows of no rule which requires amendments to be printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object to debate, and call for the regular order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to inquire of the Chair if the special order for this hour, in relation to the Louisville and Portland Canal, is simply postponed until this matter is disposed of?

The SPEAKER. That is all; it will come up when this matter is disposed of.

Mr. COX. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. All this interlocutory discussion is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then I object.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to know if the motion to suspend the rules includes any provision for debate?

Mr. DAWES. That will be within the control of a majority of the House.

Mr. COX. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it understood that the amendments already indicated can be offered in spite of the previous question?

The SPEAKER. If the motion to suspend the rules prevails, the gentleman from Massachusetts will have charge of the bill, and he can admit an amendment, and an amendment thereto, and call the previous question. If the House seconds the demand for the previous question, it will bring the House of course to a direct vote on the two amendments, and then on the bill.

Mr. COX. But I understand that all the amendments indicated will be voted on anyhow.

The SPEAKER. That will be for the House to determine.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the motion to suspend the rules shall prevail, will it not put this $400,000,000 bill before the House for discussion and consideration in preference to the other special orders? Is it not simply substituting this bill for the bill which was reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency?

The SPEAKER. O, no; the Chair thinks not. The Chair thinks that whatever action is intended here is limited to the motion to suspend the rules for this day.

Mr. RANDALL. I believe it is within the instructions of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means to permit me to offer an amendment to make the amount $382,000,000.

Mr. BECK. That is the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] objects to further debate. The question is upon seconding the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the rules be suspended and the bill brought before the House.

Mr. TREMAIN. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to announce that his purpose in moving to suspend the rules was to bring this bill before the House and allow two amendments to be offered, one of which, he said, would be presented by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS.] The point I desire to submit is that, by way of explanation, that amendment should be read so that we may know what we are voting on.

The SPEAKER. It is not within the competency of the Chair to order it to be read except by unanimous consent. The Chair understands that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is to fix the amount at $356,000,000; the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS] is to fix it at $382,000,000, while the original bill fixes it at $400,000,000. If the bill is brought before the House the Chair will state the position of it so that a majority of the House may take such action as they choose.

Mr. BECK. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded gentlemen will please not address the Chair. This being an important question the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. DAWES, and the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. MAYNARD, to act as tellers upon seconding the motion for a suspension of the rules.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 146, noes not counted.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The question was then taken upon the motion to suspend the rules and bring the bill before the House for consideration; and upon a division there were—ayes 154, noes 34.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

Mr. DAWES. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS] to offer an amendment.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. First stating that the amount of legal-tenders now outstanding is $382,000,000, I move the amendment I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the words "declared to be in force," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

To the extent that the total amount of legal-tender notes of the United States issued or to be issued, shall be, and shall never exceed, $382,000,000.

Mr. DAWES. I move to amend the amendment so as to strike out all of the bill after the seventh line, and insert what I send to the Clerk's desk. I also ask the Clerk to read the bill as it will be if my amendment shall be adopted.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the words "be, and the same are hereby," in line 7, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

So far amended that hereafter the total amount of United States notes in circulation, at any one time, shall not exceed $356,000,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to withdraw from circulation and to cancel whatever amount of such notes are now in circulation beyond that sum, as soon as the same can be done consistently with the exigencies of the Treasury.

The bill as proposed to be amended was read, as follows:

That the provisions of law existing prior to the passage of the act approved April 12, 1866, entitled "An act to amend an act to provide ways and means to support the Government, approved March 3, 1865," be, and the same are hereby, so far amended that hereafter the total amount of United States notes in circulation at any one time shall not exceed $356,000,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to withdraw from circulation and to cancel whatever amount of such notes are now in circulation beyond that sum as soon as the same can be done consistently with the exigencies of the Treasury.

Mr. COBURN. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. DAWES. Under the instructions of the Committee on Ways and Means I am compelled to call the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the amendment of my colleague [Mr. COBURN] may be read.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object. I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] but as we have got into such a strait-jacket I propose that we shall go on that way.

Mr. ORTH. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the House should refuse to second the call for the previous question would it then be in order to move other amendments to this bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the precise attitude of the bill which has been brought before the House from the Committee of the Whole. The bill fixes the amount of legal-tender notes of the United States at $400,000,000. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS,] of the Committee on Ways and Means, moves an amendment to fix the amount at $382,000,000, the amount now issued. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, moves to amend the amendment so as to fix the amount at $356,000,000, calling in all in excess of that sum now issued. Should the previous question be seconded the first vote will be upon the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts. If the previous question should not be seconded on the whole bill, as now asked, it would necessarily have to be seconded upon these amendments before any further amendment could be offered, because those now offered exhaust the power of amendment, there being an amendment and an amendment to an amendment pending.

Mr. ORTH. Should the previous question not be seconded, and the amendments now pending be voted down, then the bill would be subject to further amendments?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Suppose the House should adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, which is the first in order, what will be the effect in regard to the amendment of the gentleman from New York?

The SPEAKER. It would take the place of the amendment of the gentleman from New York, but there would have to be a second vote in order to incorporate the amendment in the bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It would be equivalent to rejecting the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot state what it would be equivalent to.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Should the House refuse to second the previous question, would not the bill and amendments then be before the House for debate?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that in that event the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who has a special order after the morning hour to-day, would be entitled to the floor.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That matter can be dealt with by a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the special order under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. RANDALL. In case the House should fix $400,000,000 as the limit, there would then be $18,000,000 of that $400,000,000 not issued. Can I then offer an amendment providing for the disposition of that $18,000,000 in liquidating the public debt?

The SPEAKER. Not if the previous question is seconded.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means permit me, if the sum of $400,000,000 is fixed as the limit, to submit an amendment providing that the $18,000,000 of the reserve fund still in the Treasury shall be used for the liquidation of the public debt, for I can see no other means of getting it out of the Treasury?

Mr. BECK. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon seconding the call for the previous question, and the two gentlemen from Massachusetts, Mr. DAWES and Mr. BUTLER, will act as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 122, noes 70.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] fixing the amount of legal-tenders at $356,000,000.

Mr. NEGLEY and others called for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. If this amendment should prevail, it will require another vote to place it in the bill. It now stands as an amendment to an amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 70, nays 171, not voting 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Archer, Barnum, Bass, Bromberg, Buffinton, Burleigh, Clayton, Clymer, Cox, Crooke, Dawes, DeWitt, Eames, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, Joseph R. Hawley, Hendee, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Smith, Stanard, Stephens, St. John, Stowell, Swann, Sypher, Charles R. Thomas, Christopher Y. Thomas, Waddell, White, Whiteley, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, Willie, Wilshire, and Ephraim K. Wilson—49.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. PLATT, of New York. My colleague, Mr. FREEMAN CLARKE, is detained at home by sickness. I am authorized to state that if here he would vote "ay."

Mr. BECK. My colleague, Mr. JOHN YOUNG BROWN, is absent on account of sickness in his family. If he were present he would vote "no."

Mr. TODD. My colleague, Mr. MOORE, is detained at home by sickness. If here he would vote "no."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS,] fixing the amount of legal-tenders at $382,000,000, the amount now outstanding, instead of $400,000,000, as proposed in the bill.

Mr. MERRIAM. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The amendment to the amendment having been defeated, have I the right to offer an amendment fixing the amount at $400,000,000, $25,000,000 of which shall be the reserve?

The SPEAKER. The previous question operates clear through to the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is in order, I believe, to reconsider the vote ordering the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The previous question being partly executed cannot be reconsidered.

Mr. DAWES. I demand the yeas and nays on the pending amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 74, nays 171, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Bass, Bromberg, Buffinton, Burchard, Burleigh, Clymer, Cotton, Cox, Crooke, Darrall, Dawes, Eames, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Eugene Hale, Robert S. So the amendment was disagreed to.

During the,

Mr. PLATT, of New York, said: In behalf of my colleague, Mr. CLARKE, I am requested to say that if he were present he would vote "no."

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. COBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know whether or not it would be in order to move to recommit this bill, with instructions to report forthwith a certain amendment which I have. It provides for the striking out of the last two lines on page 2 of this bill.

Mr. BECK. I object to debate, and demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order to move an amendment.

Mr. COX. I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask consent to have read an amendment I propose to offer.

The SPEAKER. No amendment to the bill is in order as it stands.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask to have this read by consent.

Mr. BECK. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York, that the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. HOOPER. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 24, noes not counted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think there are sufficient for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PHELPS demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House refused to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. RANDALL. I make another appeal to have my amendment read.

[Cries of "Regular order!" "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question now is, shall the bill as it comes from the Committee of the Whole, without amendment, be now engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. DAWES. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. COX. Has the bill been engrossed?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. COX. Then I make the point.

The SPEAKER. The House has not yet ordered it to be engrossed. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I wanted to be in time, as the Chair is so prompt.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order now to move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered?

The SPEAKER. It would not; as the previous question is partly executed, amendments having been twice voted on under it.

Mr. BECK. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HYNES. I rise to a parliamentary question.

Mr. BECK. I wish to have the bill engrossed while the yeas and nays are being called.

Mr. HYNES. Will it not be in order, after this vote, to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered?

The SPEAKER. After this vote?

Mr. HYNES. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The previous question, which was called by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] exhausts itself upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill. He will then be entitled to the floor on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time; and there were—yeas 168, nays 80, not voting 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Banning, Barber, Barry, Beck, Begole, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Bundy, Benjamin F. Butler, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Comingo, Conger, Cook, Corwin, Crooke, Crossland, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Davis, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Durham, Eden, Eldredge, Farwell, Field, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Giddings, Glover, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hereford, Holman, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hunton, Hurlbut, Hyde, Kasson, Killinger, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Lamport, Lansing, Lawrence, Leach, Lewis, Loughridge, Lowe, Lynch, Marshall, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, McKee, McLean, McNulta, Milliken, Monroe, Myers, Neal, Niblack, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Isaac C. Parker, Pelham, Phillips, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Pratt, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Rawls, Ray, Rice, Richmond, Robbins, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloss, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, Southard, Speer, Sprague, Standeford, Strait, Strawbridge, Taylor, Thornburgh, Todd, Tyner, Vance, Wallace, Jasper D. Ward, Wells, Whitehead, Whiteley, Whitthorne, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—168.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Archer, Barnum, Bass, Bromberg, Buckner, Buffinton, Burchard, Burleigh, Clayton, Clymer, Cotton, Cox, Dawes, DeWitt, Eames, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, Joseph R. Hawley, Hendee, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hooper, Hoskins, Hynes, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Lawson, Lowndes, Luttrell, Magee, MacDougall, Mellish, Merriam, Mitchell, Negley, Nesmith, Niles, O'Brien, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Poland, Potter, Randall, Read, Ellis H. Roberts, Sawyer, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Smart, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Starkweather, Stone, Storm, Townsend, Tremain, Waldron, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Ephraim K. Wilson, and Woodford—80.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Albright, Barrere, Biery, Brown, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Creamer, Crittenden, Crocker, Darrall, Elliott, Hamilton, John W. Hazelton, Hersey, Jewett, Lofland, McJunkin, Mills, Moore, Morey, Morrison, Nunn, Purman, Small, George L. Smith, William A. Smith, Stanard, Stephens, St. John, Stowell, Swann, Sypher, Charles R. Thomas, Chrisopher Y. Thomas, Waddell, White, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, and Wilshire—42.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

During the vote,

Mr. PELHAM said: My colleague, Mr. WHITE, is confined to his room at the hotel by sickness. He had a chill last night, and at 12 o'clock was suffering from high fever. He could not be in the House to-day.

Mr. CONGER. My colleague, Mr. BURROWS, is absent on pressing business by leave of the House; and if here he ought to vote "ay." [Laughter.]

Mr. FRYE. I wish to say that my colleague, Mr. HERSEY, is detained from the House by illness.

Mr. PLATT, of New York. My colleague, Mr. CLARKE, is detained from the House by illness; if here he would vote "no."

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. DAWES. I now demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a privileged motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The bill having been ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, it will now be read the third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. DAWES. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the last vote.

Mr. BECK. And I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am on the floor, and I do not yield to the gentleman from Kentucky to make that motion. I desire to say a few words in advocacy of the motion to reconsider. I have refrained up to this time from taking any part in this debate.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to know if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] voted in the affirmative on the last vote?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I did.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of order. The question on which the House last voted was not debatable, and I raise the question whether a motion to reconsider a non-debatable motion is itself debatable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would overrule the point of order raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] but the Chair reaches the same conclusion by another mode of reasoning. The operation of the previous question was exhausted on the vote that the bill be engrossed and read a third time; and the bill being divested of the previous question, a motion to reconsider is debatable. But it is not debatable, pending the demand for the previous question on the passage of the bill, until the House settles that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Does it become debatable then?

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable pending that. If the House should vote down the demand for the previous question on the passage of the bill, then the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] would be entitled to the floor. After a close examination of the rules the Chair states that the gentleman having charge of the bill has the right at this stage to move the previous question upon its passage. And the House will observe that this still leaves it entirely within the power of the majority of the House to decide. If the House decides not to order the previous question on the passage of the bill, of course it is thrown open to debate on a motion to reconsider the vote ordering the engrossment, or to recommit with amendments, or sundry and divers other motions. But the motion which the House has the first right to determine and settle is, whether it will second the demand for the previous question on the motion for the passage of the bill, and that demand the gentleman in charge of the bill makes.

Mr. COBURN. Would it then be in order to move to recommit with instructions?

The SPEAKER. If the House refuses to second the previous question on the passage of the bill, it will then be in order to move to recommit the bill with instructions; and it will then also be in order for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to debate the bill on the motion to reconsider the vote ordering the engrossment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the Chair hear this question of parliamentary law: Whether or not it would be in order now to move to reconsider the vote for the third reading and engrossment of the bill? If I cannot debate, can I have a vote on the reconsideration?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then why not have debate on what you can have a vote upon?

The SPEAKER. Because you did not have a debate on the direct question, on which there was the vote which you move to reconsider. Why should you have a debate backwards any more than forwards on the question? You have just the same right precisely now as before. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] can move to reconsider, and has the right to have that question determined, but not to debate it pending the demand for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The question being taken on seconding the previous question on the passage of the bill, there were—ayes 156, noes 34.

So the previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, which was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. POTTER. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 168, nays 77, not voting 45; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BECK. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Kentucky withdraw the motion to lay on the table for a moment?

Mr. BECK. I must insist on the regular order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask a single moment.

Mr. BECK. Very well.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I only desire to say that I have voted for this bill in part, because, representing the interests of New England, I did not think it worth while to peril all those interests by flinging her directly in the face of the whole country.

Mr. BECK. I now ask for a vote on my motion.

The question was put on Mr. BECK's motion, and it was agreed to.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair could not at the moment place his eye on the rule which he was compelled to enforce a moment ago, but he now directs the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is in order, pending the demand for the previous question on the passage of a bill, to move a reconsideration of the vote on its engrossment. But such motion is not debatable under the practice which has prevailed for many years.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 485) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the schooner Carrie, of Eastport, Maine.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 212) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use, for the removal of the Kickapoos and other Indians on the borders of Texas and Mexico, to the Indian Territory, and for their support after such removal, the unexpended balances of appropriations made for the above purpose, by acts approved July 15, 1870, and March 3, 1871, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

Mr. HAYS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2650) to amend the act entitled "An act to prevent cruelty to animals while in transit by railroad or other means of transportation within the United States," approved March 3, 1873; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the committee.

INDIAN EXPENSES.

Mr. HANCOCK. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of passing a bill from the Committee on Appropriations, reappropriating certain unexpended balances of appropriations for the removal of Indians.

The bill was read.

The first section reappropriates the unexpended balance of the appropriations made by the acts of July 15, 1870, and March 3, 1871, for the removal of the Kickapoo and other American Indian tribes roving on the borders of Mexico and Texas, to reservations within the Territories of the United States, and for their settlement and subsistence on such reservations, and authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to use said unexpended balances to defray the expenses incurred by the removal of said Kickapoo Indians, and locating and subsisting them in the Indian Territory, provided that the amount shall be in full of all expenses and obligations incurred in the removal of said Indians; and that the Secretary of the Interior, in disbursing the same, shall see that all promises and obligations incurred by the commissioners appointed to remove said Indians shall be fully met and discharged from the said amount.

The second section authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to expend, for the purpose of defraying the expenses incurred and to be incurred for the removal of the Winnebago Indians, in Wisconsin, from their present home in that State to their reservation in Nebraska, and for their subsistence during such removal and in their new home, the unexpended balance of the sum of $36,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, appropriated by the sixth section of the act of May 29, 1872, for said purpose, the amount to be in full of all expenses and obligations incurred in the removal of the Indians; and the Secretary of the Interior, in disbursing the same, is to see that all promises and obligations incurred to the said Indians shall be fully met and discharged from the amount.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded; and the question being put, the rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the bill (H. R. No. 2651) was passed.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has had a bill before the House as a special order for several Mondays, in relation to the Louisville and Portland Canal. As the day has been taken up by other business, he desires that it be continued as the special order for Monday next, on the same conditions. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered. The Chair hears none. And, indeed, the bill would remain the special order under the rules.

AMENDMENTS TO LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I move that the rules be suspended, so that it shall be in order to offer what I send to the Clerk's desk as an amendment to the legislative, &c., appropriation bill in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. There are two or three amendments of this character which gentlemen desire to offer, and as the bill is now pending, the Chair thinks it right that the House should have an opportunity to decide upon them to-day, because if they are not decided on to-day it will be too late.

The Clerk read Mr. G. F. HOAR'S proposition, as follows:

That no civil officer of the Government shall hereafter receive any compensation or perquisites, directly or indirectly, from the Treasury or property of the United States, or shall make any private use of such property, or of the services or labor of any person in the employment or service of the United States, which service or labor is paid for by the United States: Provided, That this shall not be construed to deprive any officer of the United States of such fees as are or may be expressly provided by law in addition to the salary of such officer, or of the use of such property as may be expressly by law appropriated to the use of such officer.

The motion to suspend the rules was then seconded.

The question was taken on the motion to suspend the rules; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the amendment was made in order to the legislative, &c., appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I move that the rules be so suspended that it may be in order for me to move the following amendment to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, when its consideration shall again be resumed in Committee of the Whole:

Provided, That Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress shall, from the first Monday in December, 1874, be paid only the actual individual traveling expenses incurred in going to and returning from their residences to the seat of Government by the most direct route of usual travel, once each session of the House to which such Senators, Representatives, or Delegates belong, to be certified under their hands to the disbursing officer of each House, and filed as a voucher.

The question was taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules; and upon a division there were—ayes 68, noes 86.

So the motion was not seconded.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I move that the rules be suspended so that it shall be in order to offer in Committee of the Whole an amendment to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill repealing so much of the act entitled "An act to provide for the election of a Government Printer," approved February 22, 1867, as provides for the election of such printer by the Senate, and as declares such printer an officer of the Senate; and providing for the appointment of such officer, when a vacancy shall hereafter occur, by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or in any other constitutional manner.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded, and the motion agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

JOHN J. GUTHRIE.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2652) relieving the legal and political disabilities of John J. Guthrie, of North Carolina; which was read three times and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

TELEGRAPH IN SOUTH WING OF CAPITOL.

Mr. PIERCE moved to suspend the rules, and adopt the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas there is reason to believe that important telegraphic dispatches recently sent from this city have been surreptitiously obtained by unprincipled persons, and it appears that the insufficient protection of the telegraphic apparatus in the various places in the south wing of the Capitol renders it very easy for unprincipled persons to get copies of private telegrams by listening to the operations of the instrument: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the architect of the Capitol be, and he is hereby, directed to cause the telegraphic instruments located in the corridors and galleries of the south wing of the Capitol to be so isolated that it shall be impossible for any unauthorized person to hear and obtain the messages sent to or from this wing of the Capitol.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded, and the motion agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

INFECTIOUS AND CONTAGIOUS DISEASES.

The SPEAKER. There comes over from Monday last a motion submitted by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] to so suspend the rules as to make a special order for Monday next the bill in relation to the importation of infectious and contagious diseases. The Louisville and Portland Canal bill has been made the order for Monday next immediately after the morning hour. The question will now be put upon suspending the rules and making the bill of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] the special order for Monday next, after the disposal of the Louisville and Portland Canal bill.

The question was taken on seconding the motion, and upon a division there were—ayes 52, noes 51; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BROMBERG and Mr. COX were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 101, noes 42.

So the motion was seconded.

The question was then taken on suspending the rules, and upon a division there were—ayes 101, noes 45.

Before the result of this vote was announced Mr. COX called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, there being but 17 in the affirmative, not one-fifth of a quorum.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the order made.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to so suspend the rules as to make in order the clause on page 21 of the printed legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which reduces the pay of gaugers.

The motion was seconded and agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. GARFIELD. I further move to suspend the rules and make in order the last two sections of the same bill. I ask the Clerk to read those sections.

The Clerk read the sections as follows:

SEC. 3. That hereafter the rooms of each Department shall be kept open for public business, and the clerical and other force therein shall be employed, not less than seven hours in each working-day, from which time an intermission, not exceeding one-half hour each day, may be taken, under rules to be established by the head of each Department.

SEC. 4. That on the 1st day of July of each year the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause all unexpended balances of appropriations, which shall have remained upon the books of the Treasury for two fiscal years, to be carried to the surplus fund.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am opposed to the third section; I do not think it is appropriate to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded, and agreed to upon a division—ayes 98, noes not counted—two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. TREMAIN. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to move to so suspend the rules that the House shall pass the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House does not concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill repealing the bankrupt law, and requests a committee of conference.

Mr. RANDALL. That will put the whole matter in the power of three members of this House. I would inquire of the gentleman if the Senate amendments have been considered in full by the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. TREMAIN. Not all; partly.

The motion to suspend the rules was not seconded upon a division—ayes 35, noes not counted.

ADDITIONAL JUDICIAL DISTRICT IN NEW YORK.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I move to so suspend the rules as to bring before the House for consideration at this time the bill for the creation of a fourth judicial district in the State of New York. I make this motion on behalf of twenty-nine members of this House, the entire delegation from New York, with the exception of certain gentlemen who are out of the city. If the House will take up the bill the vote shall be taken after fifteen minutes for explanation. As the House is aware, the late judge of the northern district of New York is dead, and there are reasons which make it desirable that the bill should be acted upon at once.

The question was taken on seconding the motion; and upon a division there were—ayes 75, noes 63; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SMITH, of New York, and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 86, noes 60.

So the motion was seconded.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules and bring the bill before the House, there were—ayes 69, noes 59; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. Two-thirds have not voted in the affirmative. Is a further count insisted upon?

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Yes, sir. I hope the House understands that I have simply asked the opportunity of making an explanation of this bill, and then taking a vote, so that the matter can be put at rest. It is a matter of great importance; and the delegation from the State of New York ask it. Are we asking anything unreasonable?

Mr. SPEER. I object to debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I call for a further count.

Mr. WOOD. My colleague [Mr. SMITH] is not authorized to state that the whole delegation from the State of New York is in favor of this proposition.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I simply said (if my colleague will pardon me) that the whole delegation was asking for the consideration of the measure.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SMITH, of New York, and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 95, noes 54.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the motion to suspend the rules was not agreed to.

PAY OF MAIL AGENTS AND CONTRACTORS.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I move to suspend the rules and pass a bill to authorize payment of mail agents and mail contractors for services rendered previous to April 4, 1861.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to mail contractors and mail agents, for services rendered by them previous to April 4, 1861, such sums of money as may be justly due them under the contracts of the Government of the United States; but no money is to be paid under this act on any account which is not already audited by the proper auditing officer of the Post-Office Department, existing law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say that this subject is before the Committee on Appropriations. A long communication from the Postmaster-General is in the hands of the committee, and they are discussing the question how much ought to be appropriated for this service. I hope we shall not make an appropriation in this summary way, and an indefinite appropriation, too.

Mr. MAYNARD. I fear that, legislating in this way, we shall not cover all cases that ought to be covered. I trust that this matter will be carefully examined by some appropriate committee before the House acts upon it finally.

Mr. GARFIELD. We have before our committee a lengthy communication from the Postmaster-General on the subject, and we expect to report upon the matter.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. This bill only covers those cases which have been audited. These claims have been pending nine years. The majority of the House, having absolute control of legislation here, has been very kind in removing, so far as this House is concerned, the political disabilities of every man in the South; and this is a measure in the same direction. These accounts are just, the services have been performed by these people under legal contracts with the Government, and I hope the House will now pass this bill.

A MEMBER. What amount does it cover?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. About $200,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is asking a good deal to expect the House to pass a bill for so large an amount in this hasty manner.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. The House has once passed the bill.

The question being taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules, there were—yeas 58, noes not counted.

So the motion was not seconded.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was presented by Mr. LUCKEY, one of his secretaries; who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1015) to authorize the President to accept, for citizens of the United States, the jurisdiction of certain tribunals in the Ottoman dominions and Egypt, established, or to be established, under the authority of the Sublime Porte and of the government of Egypt;

An act (H. R. No. 1577) for the relief of Susan L. Galloway;

An act (H. R. No. 1956) for the relief of Willard Davis; and

An act (H. R. No. 2228) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the propeller William M. Tweed, of Buffalo.

STAMPS ON MATCHES AND BANK-CHECKS.

Mr. LAWRENCE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be, and are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of dispensing with stamps on matches and bank-checks, and of reviving in lieu thereof the internal-revenue tax on lotteries, theaters, and places of public amusement.

SUSPENSION OF WORK ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2653) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend work on the public buildings; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 24, 1874.

Prayer by Rev. JOHN E. TWITCHELL, D. D., of Cleveland, Ohio.

On motion of Mr. KELLY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KELLY. I present sundry petitions from a number of citizens of Oregon, asking the Senate to investigate certain charges which they prefer against Hon. JOHN H. MITCHELL, being similar to the petition which I presented a month or so ago. I move the reference of these petitions to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOGY presented the petition of Casper Gimber, praying payment for property destroyed by military order; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SCOTT presented a petition of citizens of Blair County, Pennsylvania, deprecating the restoration of the duties on tea and coffee, or a revival or increase of internal taxes, and praying for the repeal of section 2 of the act of June 6, 1872, reducing certain duties 10 per cent.; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DENNIS presented a memorial of citizens of Baltimore, merchants engaged in the wholesale and retail hat business, protesting against any further extension of the patent granted to Henry A. Wells for forming hat-bodies; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. WEST. I present the memorial of Orleans Grange No. 53, Order of Patrons of Husbandry, Louisiana, praying for the increase of the duties on sugars. The relief asked for, Mr. President, by these memorialists is probably not within reach during the present session of Congress; but I take occasion to say that my investigation of the subject of this memorial has satisfied me that the present method of imposing duties upon sugars conduces to fraud upon the revenue; that is to say, the duty is imposed by color instead of quality; and on the proper occasion, when the subject comes before the Senate, I will endeavor to demonstrate that to Congress and ask for the necessary relief. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I present the petition of a number of citizens of New Jersey, stating that, in view of the fact that there is frequently an excess of currency at the money centers and no provision has been made for the redemption of United States notes, they ask the passage of a law for the redemption of United States notes in bonds bearing 3.65 per cent. interest, the bonds to be payable in United States notes on demand. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADLEIGH presented the petition of A. Wilbor and others, citizens of Nashua, New Hampshire, praying for the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, making a reduction of 10 per cent. in the duties upon manufactured cottons, woolens, iron, steel, paper, leather, glass, metals, and other staple commodities; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a petition of citizens of Minnesota, praying the establishment of a post-route from Marshall, in the county of Lyon, Minnesota, to Lake Kampeska, in the Territory of Dakota; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MORTON. I present a petition, signed by numerous citizens of Evansville, Indiana, and its vicinity, on a very important matter in relation to a bridge across the Ohio River, and I ask to have the petition read; it is very short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, your petitioners, citizens of Indiana and Kentucky, respectfully pray that so much of the second section of the act of Congress, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of bridges across the Ohio River, and to prescribe the dimensions of the same," approved December 17, 1872, as requires that all bridges over the Ohio River below the Covington and Cincinnati suspension bridge shall have, in addition to the high span thereinbefore prescribed "with a pivot draw giving two clear openings of one hundred and sixty feet each," be so amended that all such bridges may be constructed with either one continuous span giving a clear opening of four hundred feet, or with a pivot draw giving two clear openings of one hundred and sixty feet, as the bridge company in each case may determine: Provided, however, That such bridges as may be built under this act shall conform in all other respects to the requirements of the act above mentioned.

Mr. MORTON. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Commerce, and I desire to call the attention of the committee to it at the earliest period.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON presented a petition of citizens of Stony Point, Indiana, praying that the postal code be amended so as to require and facilitate prepayment on all matter, and determine postmasters' salaries by a more equal and less intricate system; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MORTON. I present a memorial signed by numerous citizens of Texas. It is too long to ask that it be read in full. It refers to a number of matters, but I will only state the substance of the most important things in the memorial.

It sets forth that an act of Congress was passed in 1869 for the reconstruction of Texas, Mississippi, and Virginia; that under that act of Congress an election was ordered by the President to be held in Texas for delegates to a convention to form a State constitution; that election was held; delegates were elected, the convention assembled, and the constitution was formed. The convention passed what they called an election ordinance, providing for holding an election for governor, State officers, members of the Legislature, and county officers, in the month of July, 1869. The military commandant of Texas under the reconstruction acts, General Reynolds, disregarded that ordinance, conceiving that the election was to be held under military authority under the acts of Congress. The election was held in the month of November for all State officers, members of the Legislature, and county officers. Mr. Davis was elected governor of the State. Immediately after his election, General Reynolds, the military commandant, appointed Mr. Davis as provisional governor of the State until such time as the constitution of the State should be accepted by Congress and the new State government should go into operation. Governor Davis acted as provisional governor of the State from that time forward until the new State government was duly installed. On the 30th of March, 1870, Congress passed an act accepting the constitution that had been formed for Texas, and declaring the right of the State to representation in Congress, and after the passage of that act, on the 28th of April, 1870, Governor Davis was installed as governor, and the new constitution went into operation. By the terms of the constitution of Texas, as set forth in this memorial—

The governor shall hold his office for the term of four years from the time of his installment, and until his successor shall be qualified.

Governor Davis, as I before stated, was installed on the 28th of April, 1870, and by the terms of the constitution was to hold his office for four years from that time. The memorial then recites that the person declared to be elected governor at the election held in Texas last November was installed and took possession of the office, against the protest of Governor Davis and others, in the month of January, 1874, more than three months before the expiration of the term of office of Governor Davis.

According to the statements contained in the memorial and the constitutional provision referred to, Governor Davis was deprived of his office more than three months before the expiration of his term, and the new State government elected at that time went into office some three months in advance of the time when they were entitled to assume their offices, taking it for granted that the election at which they were declared to be elected was legally and constitutionally held. The memorial also recites that the election law under which the election was held in November last was in violation of the constitution of the State, and has since been declared to be so by the supreme court of the State.

These, I believe, are the material averments of the memorial. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. I present the petition of Robert Coleman and 8 other colored men, late soldiers in the Army of the United States, who represent to Congress that they have been defrauded out of their bounty-money. I have reason to know that a great many of the colored soldiers in my State have been so defrauded.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and trust they will institute an examination into this matter.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KELLY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 624) to authorize the issuance of patents for lands granted to the State of Oregon in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM ROOD.

Mr. KELLY. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 245) for the relief of William Rood, late private of the Thirty-sixth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, to report it back without amendment and ask for its present consideration. It is a very small matter.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which directs the Adjutant-General of the Army to remove the charge of desertion from the name of William Rood, late private Company E, Thirty-sixth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers, in view of his death while in service; and to provide that his father shall be allowed and paid the back pay, bounty, and additional bounty due him, in the same manner and to the same extent as if the charge of desertion had never been made, and application therefor had been filed before the 30th of January, 1873.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRACTICE IN TERRITORIAL COURTS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the bill (S. No. 399) concerning the practice in territorial courts and appeals therefrom, and the bill (S. No. 447) concerning practice in civil cases in the territorial courts, reported them adversely; and the bills were postponed indefinitely.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am also instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1762) concerning the practice in territorial courts and appeals therefrom, to report the same back without amendment, recommend its passage, and ask for its present consideration.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The preamble recites that by the organic acts establishing several of the Territories of the United States it is provided that certain courts thereof shall have common-law and chancery jurisdiction, and doubts have been entertained whether those jurisdictions must be exercised separately, or whether they may be exercised together in the same proceeding, and whether the codes and rules of practice adopted in the Territories which have authorized a mingling of those jurisdictions in the same proceeding, or a uniform course of proceeding in all cases legal and equitable, are repugnant to the organic acts respectively.

The first section of the bill therefore provides that it shall not be necessary in any of the courts of the several Territories of the United States to exercise separately the common-law and chancery jurisdictions vested in the courts; and that the several codes and rules of practice adopted in the Territories respectively, in so far as they authorize a mingling of jurisdictions or a uniform course of proceeding in all cases, whether legal or equitable, be confirmed; and that all proceedings heretofore had or taken in the courts in conformity with those respective codes and rules of practice, so far as relates to the form and mode of proceeding, be validated and confirmed; provided that no party has been, or shall be, deprived of the right of trial by jury in cases cognizable at common law.

The second section provides that the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States over the judgments and decrees of the territorial courts in cases of trial by jury shall be exercised by writ of error, and in all other cases by appeal, according to such rules and regulations as to form and modes of proceeding as the Supreme Court have prescribed, or may hereafter prescribe; but on appeals, instead of the evidence at large, a statement of the facts of the case in the nature of a special verdict, and also the rulings of the court on the admission or rejection of evidence when excepted to, shall be made and certified by the court below and transmitted to the Supreme Court, together with the transcript of the proceedings and judgment or decree; but no appellate proceedings in the Supreme Court heretofore taken upon any such judgment or decree are to be invalidated by reason of being instituted by writ of error or by appeal; and the appellate court may make any order in any case heretofore appealed which may be necessary to save the rights of the parties.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not object to its consideration, but I desire to move an amendment to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the bill, and it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STEVENSON. I now move to amend the bill by inserting at the end thereof the following:

And that this act shall not apply to cases now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States where the record has already been filed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This amendment was considered by the Committee on the Judiciary and not approved. The case is this: The organic acts of the several Territories provide for common-law and equity jurisdiction. In those Territories they have adopted codes, rules of practice, which mingle those two jurisdictions. A case was brought up to the Supreme Court some six months since, and they decided that those codes were in violation of the organic law; and consequently a good deal of disturbance is made in judgments and decrees which have been rendered in the Territories. This is a mere remedial act. Since that decision of the Supreme Court a number of appeals have been taken to reverse even the foreclosure of mortgages and other familiar proceedings because of this hidden defect. This bill, without the amendment, provides that the Supreme Court may make all equitable arrangements in reference to cases which are now pending; and I do not think the amendment ought to prevail which would limit this act and exclude cases which have been brought up.

Mr. STEWART. I am quite confident that the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky ought not to prevail. The organic acts of the Territories confer upon the courts common-law and equity jurisdiction, and they provide for that jurisdiction being exercised as shall be provided by law. The Territories have uniformly undertaken by legislation to provide for the exercise of that jurisdiction, and in doing so they have adopted codes. The Supreme Court, I think without much consideration, held that it was not competent for a territorial Legislature to make such provision for the exercise of this common-law and equity jurisdiction; but the idea was—though they have not gone quite to that extent—that the practice should be according to the original principles of exercising separate common-law and separate equity jurisdiction, as in the courts of England and of the United States. The Supreme Court, I think, at the time did not realize the importance of the question. The decision was made by a divided court, and without having the magnitude of the question before them. It has created a good deal of difficulty. Quite a number of cases of the ordinary collections of debt, the foreclosure of mortgages, and ordinary proceedings of that sort, have come up, I understand; and I know from my personal knowledge that there has been a good deal of disturbance and a good deal of uncertainty in consequence of this decision of the Supreme Court. It is not necessary for the point to be taken in the court below at all, but the cases come up here as a matter of jurisdiction.

It seems to me this measure is purely remedial. No vested rights can be affected by it; but it is a question whether the difficulty shall be remedied that has arisen from this decision of the Supreme Court, which, I think, was not fully considered. It does not affect any particular party any more than it does the general administration of the Territories. I do not know now what cases have been brought up, but I know this question has been one of great embarrassment for the last two or three years, and has really disturbed the administration of justice. Nobody can be injured by letting justice be administered without that technical difficulty, for it is merely technical. It is of the flimsiest character of technicality. No substantial rights are involved in it. Under the decision of the Supreme Court it is impossible for the territorial courts to administer justice with the great body of legislation that they have; and that flimsy technical difficulty should be got out of the way so that justice may be administered in the Territories. The bill is very important in that view.

Mr. CARPENTER, (Mr. HOWE in the chair.) The bill itself is undoubtedly right, and should pass; but I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky should pass also. Whether the adoption of that amendment, if it be adopted, may not render it necessary to amend one of the sections of the bill, I am not certain, the bill not being before me. The Supreme Court of the United States have made a certain decision on this question. The Senator from Nevada says he thinks it was an ill-considered and erroneous decision.

Mr. STEWART. It was by a divided court.

Mr. CARPENTER. Nevertheless it was the decision of the highest court of the Republic. Based upon that decision suitors in the territorial courts have brought cases into the Supreme Court of the United States. It is now proposed to pass this bill and send those cases all out of court pell-mell, which were properly brought when brought.

If I had been here during the rebellion, I might have voted to legislate, as Congress once or twice did, to take away the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in pending causes; but there is certainly no such state necessity here as will justify it. If a suitor in the Territories brings his case by appeal or writ of error into the Supreme Court, and it is upon the calendar of that court, upon what principle of justice can Congress reverse the rule of law and send him out of the court defeated when he would have succeeded but for that action of Congress? His rights should be determined upon the law as it stood when he brought his suit in this court.

Mr. STEWART. Suppose now there was a mere technical defect in the form of the issuance of the writ of error, some technical error not affecting the merits.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is a good question to argue to that court. If that court have made an absurd decision, let them retract it. I am inclined to think that it would be a good thing for every court now and then to be compelled to take back a hasty decision. I have the profoundest reverence for that court. At its bar I am obedient to any decision it makes, whether I think it right or wrong; but in this place I have a right to criticise them with the same freedom that they criticise us; and I think if that court now and then were compelled to say that a decision which they had made was carelessly made, and erroneously made, it would lead to greater care in making decisions. It would not hurt anybody. The greatest judges on earth have occasionally had to back out; and it would not hurt this court in this case, if they feel that injustice has been done, to say in a manly way that they made a blunder and will correct it; but if it be not a blunder, if the decision was right, then it is wrong to change the law as to existing cases. If it was a blunder, that is the tribunal to correct it, and not this body.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, it seems to me that my friend from Wisconsin gives up his argument when he states to the Senate that he admits that the bill, with this amendment, is right.

Mr. CARPENTER. My friend will allow me an explanation for one moment on that point. It is a perfectly sound rule of law to fix in the future; it has not been the law heretofore; and I do not want to punish men who have not acted under it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think my friend gives up the entire point when he admits that the bill is right, because this bill is retroactive, any way. This bill does validate hundreds and hundreds of decrees and judgments which have been made by this mixed jurisdiction that all of us approve. It is a remedial act.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend pardon me once more? I want to confess that he has me perfectly tight in saying that I have admitted what I ought not to have admitted. If the bill does that, it should not pass. I was not aware that the bill did that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Well, Mr. President, let us get it on logical grounds. I think the bill is right. By the organic law of the Territories there is a provision made for a common-law and an equity jurisdiction. By their codes and their rules for years and years those jurisdictions have been commingled. For instance, an execution would be returned nulla bona; and there would be proceedings before the court in the nature of a bill of discovery to find out whether the defendant had any property. This was all done under their rules and their codes; and there are hundreds and hundreds of judgments and decrees which are in that situation; and it is perfectly right to remove that technical objection and to validate all these proceedings. I do not think anybody can question that. It is just exactly as proper as it would be if an acknowledgment to a deed had been inaccurately drawn, or had been acknowledged before an officer not having jurisdiction, for the Legislature to come in and by a remedial act validate that deed—a thing that is constantly done and recognized. Retroactive laws which affect rights, we are all opposed to, and there is a great question whether they are constitutional at all; but retroactive laws which only affect the form and only affect the remedy are not unconstitutional, and are proper. Take the case of an acknowledgment. Suppose that my friend had brought an ejectment, and the title of his client would be defeated if an acknowledgment of the deed of his adversary was rendered valid. No one would say that it was improper legislation under certain circumstances to render valid that acknowledgment; and my friend would not dispute that it would be right that it should apply to his case, although he was in court with his action of ejectment. It would not affect his rights; it would only affect the formality of the thing; and therefore it is perfectly right that this remedial act should apply to suits which are now pending. But to guard against any injustice, there is in this bill a provision that the Supreme Court shall have authority to protect the rights of suitors who have cases now pending in court. Therefore I think the bill, without any amendment, ought to commend itself to the judgment of the Senate, as it did to the judgment of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. STEWART. Nineteen-twentieths of all the litigation that has been had in the Territories for the last twenty years is subject to this identical objection; and if it be the fact that we cannot remedy it at all by legislation, we are certainly in a very peculiar position. Nobody supposed there was any such defect. Nobody supposed that any such question could arise; and I do not believe it would occur to any lawyer in the Senate on reading the organic act. I was never more astonished than when the decision came. The objection is certainly merely technical. We let parties go on without any real remedy in the courts, and deny them the practical administration of justice if this defect cannot be remedied. It is a very important thing.

The decision was rendered by a divided court, and, I think, without argument on the part of those familiar with the subject. Very few cases had come up from the Territories. The question was passed upon in a case where no large amount was involved; and this technical difficulty got in. It does not matter in what stage of the proceedings it is; it does not make any difference whether the party has appealed to the Supreme Court with a view to getting delay, or whether the case is there to be taken up next week. It is a defect in the whole body of the litigation, because the Territories all have codes by which the two jurisdictions are blended. They have all pointed out how the law and equity jurisdiction conferred by the act of Congress should be exercised; and when exercised by the judges in accordance with the legislative acts, the judgments should stand. Those legislative acts of the Territories were fully authorized, as I believe, by the act of Congress. It would so occur to anybody who will read the act. It says that these courts shall have common-law and equity jurisdiction, to be exercised as shall be provided by law; that is, the law of the Territory. They have exercised that power and passed laws, and adjudications have gone on for many years. This is a purely technical objection; and if it is ever proper, under any circumstances, to remedy a merely technical error that affects no substantial right, this is the case; and a case that is now in the Supreme Court is no stronger in opposition to it than a case that has not been brought here. It affects the whole body of adjudication in the Territories.

Mr. STEVENSON. I only desire to say a word in regard to this amendment. I do not agree with the Senator from Nevada and with the Senator from New Jersey that this is an unimportant question. It reaches much farther than this present bill. It is an innovation on judicial proceedings by an interference by Congress with them. The Supreme Court of the United States as early as December, 1863, by a divided court, decided that the common-law and equity jurisdiction of the territorial courts could be blended. That had been the decision a long time before in regard to the United States courts created by the act of 1789; but Mr. Justice Swayne, Mr. Justice Field, and Mr. Justice Nelson supposed that as these courts in the Territories were created by the law which created the Territory they were not governed by the act of 1789, and therefore they held that that decision should not be affirmed; but a majority of the court in the case of Orchard vs. Hughes, in 1 Wallace, decided that the territorial courts stood on the same level with the courts of the United States created by the act of 1789, and that therefore the decree appealed from, as the two jurisdictions had been blended, must be reversed, notwithstanding the territorial act which created that court. That decision was followed in a subsequent case in another volume of Wallace. A good many decrees were appealed from. With the light of that decision before them, litigants came to the Supreme Court of the United States, employed counsel, and had their cases argued. These cases have been pending in the Supreme Court for months, ready for a decision, and Congress is asked now to step in and do away with that decision, and mulct these parties in costs for taking appeals which under the rulings of the Supreme Court they had a right to take. I think it is unjust, and I think it is a great vice in legislation whenever we shall undertake, when in the opinion of Congress one of the past rulings of the Supreme Court has been wrong, to step in by a legislative act and retrospectively take away their jurisdiction.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator allow me to inquire, as he is on the Judiciary Committee, if the parties that took those appeals had any notice of the pendency of this bill, and whether there has been any appearance entered?

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not know. They have made no appearance as far as I know. I do not know the parties; but I have been informed that there have been cases, and I have been informed by the judges themselves of the Supreme Court that that is exactly the status of this question.

Mr. President, whenever Congress shall undertake to embark in that system of assuming, when the courts shall in its opinion be wrong, to take away the jurisdiction, we enter, it seems to me, in a path full of danger and which goes to subvert the great principle that the three departments of the Government ought to be kept entirely distinct.

Were this decision now to come up, it may be that the Supreme Court would never have rendered it. Why? Because we all recognize now that equity and common law are blended in the bill offered by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin some years ago. They themselves doubt whether their original decision was right. It was decided then by a divided court, as I have already shown. Let the court take back its decision if it will, but do not let this bill pass. If, however, gentlemen are determined to pass it, then let it not apply to cases already argued in the Supreme Court, and mulct parties in costs for following the dictum of the Supreme Court; because if you set such a precedent you do not know where the mischief is to end.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, it is perfectly well settled by the courts themselves that the legislative power cannot grant a new trial in any case, because that is the exercise of judicial power. Upon what principle is this case distinguishable from that? Here a judgment has been rendered in a Territory, which is erroneous, upon which the party is entitled to a new trial. Congress is asked to pass a bill saying that he shall not have a new trial; that the judgment shall be valid, which is conceded to be invalid before the law is passed. It seems to me it is just as much an exercise of judicial power to say that a party shall not have a new trial to which he is entitled by existing law, as it is to say that he shall have a trial in a case in which he is not entitled to it by existing law.

It is not at all like the case of validating some contract executed defectively. It is curing a defect in a judgment of a subordinate court, for which defect the party is entitled to have the judgment reversed; and no man can tell how great may be the injustice to be accomplished by this bill. Take the case, for instance, in a Territory where a man has been sued for slander in a bill in chancery, or where a man has sought to foreclose a mortgage in an action of ejectment, and the party being advised by his counsel that such a suit cannot be maintained at all has for that reason omitted to put in a defense on the merits, knowing that the proceeding was wrong, and it is confessed that it is wrong; the Supreme Court has decided it is wrong; and the party is now entitled to have that erroneous judgment reversed and have a new trial in a proper proceeding. This bill proposes to take away that right of new trial, that right to reverse an erroneous judgment, and validate the judgment. I ask if that be not as completely an exercise of judicial power as it is for the Legislature to declare that a party shall not have a new trial in a case where he is entitled to it by existing law; and in that case the courts have, over and over again, decided that the Legislature have no right so to declare, that it is an exercise of judicial power to say whether the party shall or shall not have a new trial. That is precisely what this bill does.

I was under the belief when I first spoke on the bill that it provided only that these remedies should be merged in the future. I was not aware that it validated judgments in the Territories now confessed to be erroneous. It strikes me as being a monstrous proposition. It is not taking away the jurisdiction of some court, but it is exercising jurisdiction ourselves by determining here that a judgment confessed to be erroneous shall be valid. You might as well pass a bill saying that a judgment confessed to be valid shall be erroneous. One is just as much an exercise of judicial power as the other.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator from Wisconsin misapprehends this question altogether. The question is whether the courts of the Territories ought to exercise their common-law and equity jurisdiction as provided by the territorial Legislatures.

Mr. CARPENTER. No, that is not the question. The point is whether when the territorial courts have not done what the law commanded them to do we can help them out of it.

Mr. STEWART. They have done what the law commanded them to do, what the Legislatures commanded them to do, and we know the Legislatures never have provided for chancery proceedings in case of slander or recovery on a promissory note. We are presumed to know what their public acts are. I do know that none of them have done so, and if the Senator does not know it, he is presumed to know it. The only thing they have done was simply in the course of procedure to provide, as they do in the State of New York, that the common-law and equity powers of the court shall be exercised in the same suit, exercised according to a code. The Supreme Court have fallen into a palpable error. They decided years ago, and everybody understood it, that the territorial courts were peculiar courts created by the acts organizing the Territories, that they did not come under the judiciary act of 1789. I could look up half a dozen decisions to that effect.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question at that point?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARPENTER. Upon that theory the title of this bill should be amended and it should be called "An act to correct an error of the Supreme Court of the United States."

Mr. STEWART. That is not a question.

Mr. CARPENTER. That would be a fair statement of the bill, and that would show the injustice of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would be easier for the reporters if one speaker would speak at a time.

Mr. STEWART. That was the current of decision for a long time, that these were peculiar courts not organized under the act of 1789 at all, and the Senator will see that they could not be organized under the act of 1789. The courts of the United States in the States do not have general jurisdiction of all matters; they only have the jurisdiction provided by the Constitution of the United States. On the question of parties, or of subject-matter, they cannot go into general business; that is left to the States. But these courts have a peculiar jurisdiction conferred by act of Congress on all matters, not only the jurisdiction exercised by United States courts in the States, but also what would be exercised by State courts. The whole matter is before these courts, and it was under the general power, as was stated by the Supreme Court formerly when the question first came up, of Congress to legislate for the Territories that these courts were organized. A judge can be removed from them; a judge of a United States court cannot be removed. They are not United States courts in any sense. They exist by virtue of the organization of the Territories. That was so understood until this case of Orchard vs. Hughes came up to the Supreme Court. The court say:

The decree in the present case was rendered in a territorial court, and it has been contended that this court is not a court under the Constitution, nor organized under the judiciary act of 1789—

I think that is very plain—

but by the "Legislature of the Territory under the organic law," and whose jurisdiction is regulated by that law, and therefore that the decision in the case of Noonan vs. Lee does not apply. Of this opinion are Messrs. Justices Swayne, Field, and myself. But a majority of the court are of opinion that the case is governed by the previous one.

That is, that it comes under the principles of the act of 1789.

This part of the decree is therefore reversed, and the residue affirmed.

The court having fallen into an error and confounded territorial courts with United States courts in the States, without due consideration and without argument, and affected the whole jurisprudence of the Territories, the question here is whether that error shall be corrected, and whether the great body of the legislation of the Territories shall stand, whether their proceedings shall stand, or whether we will encourage litigation and the bringing up of cases here on a mere technicality and deprive them of the benefits of justice governed by law. There has been a great deal of harm done by the confusion in this matter. There is no doubt about the law; there is no doubt about their being territorial courts under the existing organic acts; and there is no doubt about the authority of the territorial Legislature to regulate the exercise of their jurisdiction. It is as plain as it can be.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENSON. Why cannot the Supreme Court take back this erroneous decision—a decision which the Senator himself pronounces erroneous?

Mr. STEWART. They ought to take it back.

Mr. STEVENSON. Let them take it back, and let this bill be laid on the table.

Mr. STEWART. I do not control their action, or I would have had it taken back long ago. It has created trouble. It has brought up here foreclosures of mortgages, and ordinary proceedings, where there was really no dispute at all. It has been a stoppage to the administration of justice. It ought to have been taken back long ago. The distinction between the United States court, under the act of 1789 and the Constitution, which has a special jurisdiction, and a court that has a jurisdiction conferred under the power of Congress to govern the Territories, never should have been confounded. A Territory is not a State. In other words, the fact that a Territory is not a State should not have been lost sight of. A Territory is not a State, but is governed by the laws of Congress, while a State has a constitution and laws of its own.

Mr. STEVENSON. If the Senator will agree to help us to lay this bill on the table the Supreme Court will reverse its decision, and then innocent parties will not be mulcted in costs for having been erroneously led to take appeals.

Mr. STEWART. If the Supreme Court will reverse its decision, that will accomplish all that is accomplished by this bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. They will do so, and that is what I am in favor of.

Mr. STEWART. If we can have any guarantee that they will do that, it will accomplish all that is accomplished by this bill, and the bill might be laid on the table. But if it is a proper thing, and everybody now concedes that it is, for the court to do that, for everybody sees that it is a mere technical matter, if it is proper to give them law in the Territories, why not do it here now and not wait for any reversal of the decision? The parties will be mulcted in some costs, and more if the decision is reversed. If you go on and have the decision reviewed, it will add costs. If the court is going to reverse the decision, it will put these parties just where this bill puts them, and I want to put them there now and settle the question. The court ought to reverse the decision, and if they do so the parties who have brought up these frivolous appeals merely for the sake of delay and for the sake of throwing the Territories in confusion will be mulcted in costs. If this bill is passed, they will be mulcted in costs already accrued, but in no additional costs.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not like this bill very much, and for the reason that I dislike exceedingly to deprive a party of what is in the nature of a vested right. I do not say that, technically, the right to have an erroneous judgment reversed is a vested right, although perhaps according to some definitions, and legal ones too, of a vested right, it would not be a misnomer; but it is certainly in the nature of a vested right—the right which a man has to ask for the reversal of a decision erroneously pronounced against him, and I dislike exceedingly to interfere with that right of men to have such erroneous judgments set aside.

But in regard to the power, there is one view that I have heard nothing said about, and that strikes me as worthy of consideration, and it is that these judgments rendered in the territorial courts are not void; they are not held by the Supreme Court of the United States to be void; they are only voidable, that is, reversible; and if not reversed, they stand as good and valid judgments of a court of competent jurisdiction. It is perfectly competent for the Congress of the United States to say what shall be the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States. It may limit that appellate jurisdiction in various ways, as it has done. It may limit it by fixing the amount in controversy, and providing that where less than that is the amount in controversy there shall be no appeal. It may limit it in various other modes; and I do not know but that it may limit it in respect to the particular class of errors which are here complained of. I do not like to commit myself too strongly to the proposition that it can; but possibly where great public reasons exist, where the peace, almost, of a Territory and substantial justice in questions in litigation would require a limitation on the right of appeal based on the nature of the error assigned, I am not exactly prepared to deny that we may not limit the right of appeal in that way. Now whether this bill does that thing, whether it is the proper mode of doing it in case we can do it, I am not entirely satisfied. I will confess that I have not paid that attention to this bill which I ought to have done, and I would be glad that it might lie over until we can give it a little more attention.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 432) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase in national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870.

Mr. SHERMAN. In pursuance of the suggestion of the Chair made yesterday, I move that the pending bill be laid aside, either informally or definitely, with a view to take up the bill (S. No. 617) to provide for the redemption and reissue of United States notes and for free banking. I have no doubt that will bring us more directly to the questions at issue, and will save the consumption of time unnecessarily. I stated the effect of it last night, and I hope that will be done by general consent without any formal vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the pending bill be laid on the table, with a view to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 617.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I do not desire to cut off remarks. I only moved that it be laid aside informally.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I suppose that requires common consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair misunderstood the motion. The motion is that the pending bill be laid aside informally.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to cut off debate. I expect to move to take up Senate bill No. 617.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to say a word. I have no objection to this course; but of course nobody is committed to the new bill. There is no understanding as to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all. I only want to vote.

Mr. MORTON. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hearing no objection to the course proposed, the pending bill will be laid aside.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2651) reappropriating certain unexpended balances of appropriations for removal of Indians; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2652) relieving the legal and political disabilities of John J. Guthrie.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2651) reappropriating certain unexpended balances of appropriations for the removal of Indians was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. No. 2652) relieving the legal and political disabilities of John J. Guthrie was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CURRENCY AND BANKING.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move now that Senate bill No. 617 be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 617) to provide for the redemption and reissue of United States notes, and for free banking, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, some complaint has been made in the Senate and in the country at the delay in the presentation by the Committee on Finance of some bill covering the financial question; but a moment's reflection will, I am sure, convince every Senator that there has been no fault on the part of that committee. From the beginning of the session to this hour that committee, under the direction of the Senate, has been studying and discussing the various plans and propositions which were referred to the committee; and I may say that over sixty different propositions, either coming in the form of petitions or in the form of bills, have been sent to the committee, all of them suggesting different plans and ideas. It was impossible to consider all these and to agree upon any comprehensive measure until within a day or two.

There was another consideration. The committee found itself divided in opinion, precisely as the country is, and precisely as the Senate is, into as many as three different classes of opinion. There were, first, those who desired to take a definite and positive step toward the resumption of specie payments. There were, second, those who desired an enlargement of the currency, or what we commonly call an inflation of the currency. There were, third, those who, while willing to see the amount of bank-notes increased and the question of the legal-tenders settled in some form, were also desirous that some definite step should be taken toward a specie standard. There were these differences of opinion.

For the purpose of ascertaining the views of the Senate, and not involving ourselves in reporting a bill that would be defeated as the bill of the last session was, we presented early in the session resolutions of a general character which stated these three ideas: First, the resolution of the majority of the committee that some definite step should be taken toward specie payments. Then there was the amendment offered by the gentleman who now occupies the chair, [Mr. FERRY, of Michigan,] that there ought to be an increase of the currency without reference to any plan of redemption. Third, there was the proposition made by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] that measures should be taken at once looking to the resumption of specie payments.

These propositions were discussed, and the committee were enlightened by that discussion; at least they obtained the opinions of members of the Senate. Subsequently, in the course of our investigation, a question about the $25,000,000 section (section 6 of the act of July 12, 1870) came up, and the committee deemed it right, by a unanimous vote, to ascertain the sense of the Senate as to whether they wished this section carried into execution. As it stood upon the statute-book it was a law without force. It was a law so expressed that the Comptroller said he could not execute it. Therefore the committee reported a bill which would have provided the necessary details to carry into execution that section of the existing law. But in the present temper of the public mind in the Senate and in the country that bill was discussed, and has been discussed day after day, without approaching the question at all. During all this time the committee have been pursuing their inquiries, and finally they have reported the bill which is now before us.

The measure that is reported is not a satisfactory one to any of us in all its details. Probably it is not such as the mind of any single member of the Senate would propose. It is in the nature of a compromise bill, and therefore while it has the strength of a compromise bill, it has also the weakness of a compromise bill. There are ideas in it which, while meeting the views of a majority, taken separately will be opposed by others. I am quite sure that I say nothing new to the Senate when I say it does not in all respects meet my own views. But there is a necessity for us to yield some of our opinions. We cannot reconcile or pass any measure that will be satisfactory to the country unless we do so. Any positive victory by either extreme of this controversy will be an absolute injury to the business of the country. Therefore, any measure that is adopted ought to be so moderate, pursuing such a middle course, such a middle ground, that it will give satisfaction to the country. It must be taken as a whole; and therefore the effect of amending this proposition will be simply to destroy it. If an amendment in the direction of expansion is inserted, it will drive away some who would be willing to support it as it is. If an amendment in the way of contraction is proposed and carried by a majority of the Senate, it will drive away those who might be willing to take this measure as a compromise. The only question before the Senate now is, whether this is a fair compromise between the ideas that have divided the people of this country and the members of the Senate; whether it will surely improve our currency while giving the relief that is hoped for by a moderate increase of the currency. Now I ask the Secretary to read the first section of the bill.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the maximum limit of United States notes is hereby fixed at $382,000,000, at which amount it shall remain until reduced as hereinafter provided.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is manifest to every Senator that the initial step in this controversy is to fix the aggregate limit of United States notes. The United States notes, although they are very popular and justly so in this country, are at this moment inconvertible; they are irredeemable, and they are depreciated. These are facts admitted on all hands. In making that statement I do not intend at all to deny that the United States notes have served a great and useful purpose; and though I was here at the birth of them and advocated them in all stages of their history, yet I am compelled to say at this moment, twelve years after their issue, that they are inconvertible; they are irredeemable; and they are depreciated this day at the rate of 12 per cent. They have been legally inconvertible since July 1, 1863, and practically inconvertible since the close of the war; that is, the Government refuses to receive them either in payment of customs or in payment at par of any bond of the United States offered by it. They are irredeemable on their very face. They have depreciated almost from the date of their issue, at one time being worth only forty cents in gold, and to-day only worth ninety cents. That is the condition of the United States notes.

Now, there is another thing admitted by all Senators. I do not trespass on any disputed ground when I say that every addition to the volume of these notes, while they thus stand depreciated, irredeemable, and inconvertible, is as certain to further depreciate them, as it is that to pour water into an overflowing bucket will cause it still more to overflow; as certain as the law of gravitation; as certain as anything human or divine. It is equally true that any contraction of this currency, any withdrawal of the amount of it, is undoubtedly an appreciation of its value, making it nearer and nearer to the standard of gold.

This is so plain a proposition that it is not necessary to discuss it; and the whole people of the country understand it; the plainest and simplest people understand it as well as the wisest. Those who desire to increase prices, to start and put in operation new enterprises, desire an increase of the currency without any plan of redemption. Those, on the other hand, who want to get back to the specie standard, to appreciate the value of these notes, desire to withdraw them, get them out of the way, or give new uses and new values to them so as to advance them nearer and nearer to the standard of gold. Therefore it is that I say the very first step at the outset of this controversy is to settle what is the legal limit of these notes; how many are there now authorized by law; how many are there outstanding. And here it is a strange thing that on this very point, a purely legal question, the most important one in our financial discussion, there is a great difference of opinion. There ought not to be uncertainty or room for a difference of opinion upon a question of this kind. It ought to be settled. On the one hand it is insisted by Senators who compose the majority of the Committee on Finance that the legal limit of United States notes is $356,000,000, that the amount which has been already issued of what is known as the $44,000,000 reserve was unlawfully issued, although under great press of circumstances and without any intention on the part of the Secretary to do more than he thought he had a lawful right to do. On the other hand it is insisted by other Senators that the legal limit of United States notes is $400,000,000; and here is a margin of $44,000,000 upon which there is a dispute of law as to the power of the Secretary to issue it. That dispute ought to be settled at once. It is a question that ought not to be in doubt a moment, because the power to issue that $44,000,000 places it in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury either to advance or to lower the value of all property in the United States, of all debts in the United States, of everything that is measured by United States notes.

Should we undertake to say that the Secretary did wrong in exceeding the limit at $356,000,000? A majority of the committee believe that that is now the legal limit, and believe it conscientiously. But should we undertake to fix that as the legal limit? Twenty-six million dollars of the $44,000,000 are outstanding. They are now issued; they are now a part of the currency of the country. They are just as much the currency as that which was issued before. You cannot distinguish between them. You cannot say which of the $382,000,000 now outstanding is legal and which is illegal. So far as the United States are concerned, they are all debts of the United States which we are bound to pay whether they have been issued legally or illegally. I do not understand even my friend from Delaware to dispute the duty and obligation of the United States to pay these notes, even if they have been illegally issued. There can be no question about it. It is impossible to distinguish between them. The only question is whether our agent exceeded his authority or not. Therefore, without raising the question as to the legality of this issue, reserving to each Senator his own opinion on the subject, we have adopted as the status quo $382,000,000, the amount now outstanding; and we recognize that amount as the maximum legal obligation of the United States in the form of notes, and we propose upon that basis to erect our superstructure. We therefore say that we will raise no question as to the mode of retiring the twenty-six millions; we will simply say that the amount now outstanding shall never be exceeded. That is a recognition, at least, that they are outstanding lawfully and properly; at any rate, so far as the obligation of the United States to pay them is concerned.

Mr. President, a limit ought to be fixed. But there is a difference of opinion as to what should be the limit. If I had the power to fix this limit I should say that the limit which was fixed by the old law should remain at $356,000,000; and I would provide a mode and manner of issuing United States bonds to retire the $26,000,000 slowly and gradually, without disturbing the ordinary business of the country. I would thereby seek to recover the ground we have lost by what has occurred since the panic, and go back to the standard prior to that time. But I know that would be very difficult; that would involve an increase of the bonded debt. Our revenues are not sufficient to call in this $26,000,000. We have no surplus revenue now as we had a year or two ago. We could only do it by the issue of bonds, and the process itself would be a very hard one. Besides, it is probable that public opinion and the judgment of Congress would not sustain such a proposition; and therefore it is hardly worth while to recommend it. We assume, therefore, that the $382,000,000 is the present limit, and we say that shall be the maximum limit.

Here I beg Senators who take a different view to attend to the observations I will make upon this maximum. Those who opposed the issue of the twenty-six millions are willing to stand where we are and upon the fact as it is. Now, I ask Senators what reason can they give for enlarging this limit? At $382,000,000 we now stand. The Secretary of the Treasury does not desire to issue any more; he has said that he will not issue more except by the positive direction of Congress. What argument has been advanced in this whole debate which shows a necessity for more than the amount of notes we have already issued? A proposition has been passed by the House of Representatives, and is now upon our table—I may refer to it as a part of the history of the country—to raise the amount to four hundred millions—eighteen millions above the amount fixed by the bill reported by the Committee on Finance. What reason can be given for it? Is there not money in all the money centers to overflowing? The statements read yesterday by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] show clearly that in all the money centers there is abundance of money. What we want now is to vitalize that money, put it in circulation, restore confidence, start again the wheels of trade, with a perfect knowledge on the part of all that the amount of money outstanding is ample for every purpose. Why, sir, the great business of the country before the panic was carried on with $340,000,000 of United States legal-tender currency; all the great operations of the country in a time of unbounded prosperity, when the greatest activity prevailed, were carried on with $340,000,000, and now it is $382,000,000; and we propose to make that the basis. What argument can be given for going further? If you increase your aggregate eighteen millions beyond the $382,000,000 what is the immediate effect? It is to derange all values; to lessen, if you choose, the burden of the debtor, to confiscate the property of the creditor. You ought neither to increase the burden of the debtor nor to lessen the value of the property of the creditor. You ought to do neither except by slow general laws in accordance with public policy. But if you now increase the United States currency beyond $382,000,000, you go a step in the opposite direction. I say, therefore, without debating this matter further now, as it will come up at a later stage, that the Committee on Finance have taken as a compromise the arbitrary amount now happening to be outstanding, $382,000,000, not because $382,000,000 is the golden number and the best number and the best amount, but because it is the amount now out for which we are responsible, and no argument from the beginning to the end of this debate has gone to show that there is any necessity whatever for any increase of the United States notes. Why, sir, all our promises, the public faith solemnly pledged, the arguments that have been made by those who favor inflation, all declare and admit that at some time we must return to the specie standard; and yet all admit that if you now issue eighteen millions more of legal-tenders you depart from the specie standard and reverse the course of events for the last four or five years.

Mr. President, that is all I desire to say about the first section.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the Senator leaves that point, will he hear a suggestion?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. It is said (and I should like to hear the Senator's view about that point) that an argument for adding $18,000,000 to the amount already out is found in the necessities of the Treasury Department itself, and that the proposition comes to us as a sort of alternative, as I understand it, between voting taxes, a tax on tea and coffee for example, and allowing the discretion of the Secretary to extend to these unissued $18,000,000 of United States notes. I should be glad to hear the Senator say a word on that point.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not suppose that a member of either House of Congress would propose in this age to pay the ordinary expenses of a great and rich government like ours by printing more irredeemable paper money. This money was all issued, even during the stress of war, not to pay our debts, but as a medium of exchange by which money could be borrowed temporarily from the people by the Government. Therefore, any addition to the volume of our debt, caused by a deficient revenue, ought to be made up promptly either by taxes or by loans, not by a forced loan or by issuing $18,000,000 of paper money, and compelling people to take it to the depreciation of the value of all the property of the people of the United States. I do not deem it necessary to pursue that argument further.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. May I ask the chairman of the Finance Committee a question in relation to our power to increase the legal-tenders under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States? I understand a decision of the Supreme Court has been reached which would deny the authority of Congress to increase the legal-tenders in time of peace. I should like to hear the chairman on that point.

Mr. SHERMAN. We are all familiar with the legal-tender decisions. My opinion is that any increase of legal-tenders now, in time of peace, would be in violation of the spirit, at least, and I think of the language, of the judge who pronounced the last decision on the legal-tender cases. As a matter of course, it will not do in this general statement for me to pursue all these collateral matters, and I hope Senators will waive questions in regard to them.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I would merely, in answer to the suggestion——

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will not interrupt me.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not intend to discuss the bill; only to make a suggestion. The Supreme Court, in deciding as to the issue of legal-tenders in time of peace, made no reference whatever to legalizing the $400,000,000 of legal-tenders already issued.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will simply say, in regard to the first section, that this section, without wounding the feelings of anybody as to the question about the $44,000,000 reserve, settles forever the maximum limit of legal-tender notes.

I now ask the Secretary to read the second section of the bill, which relates entirely to a different branch of the subject.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That on the 1st day of January, 1876, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to pay on demand, at the office of the Treasurer of the United States, and at the office of the assistant treasurer in the city of New York, to any holder of United States notes to the amount of $1,000, or any multiple thereof, in exchange for such notes, an equal amount of the gold coin of the United States; or, in lieu of coin, he may, at his option, issue in exchange for said notes an equal amount of coupon or registered bonds of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe, and of denominations of fifty dollars, or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin of the present standard value, at the pleasure of the United States, after ten years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest, payable quarterly in such coin, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. And the Secretary of the Treasury may reissue the United States notes so received, or, if they are canceled, may issue United States notes to the same amount, either to purchase or redeem the public debt, or to meet the current payments for the public service. And the said bonds, and the interest thereon, shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority; and the said bonds shall have set forth and expressed upon their face the above-specified conditions, and shall, with their coupons, be made payable at the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. WRIGHT. With the consent of the chairman of the committee I wish to say one word, to remove an impression that possibly may obtain, and which I am sure he did not design should obtain, in reference to the first section. As I understood the chairman, he stated that the amount fixed in the section was the result of a compromise. I fear it may be inferred from that remark that it was the result of a compromise and agreement on the part of all members of the committee. I am sure he did not so intend; and therefore, lest the impression may obtain that it was agreed to by the members of the committee, I simply make this remark.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said it was a compromise by the committee. I speak of a majority of the committee. As a matter of course my friend is at liberty to dissent from any of its propositions. On questions of this kind committees are very rarely unanimous; but I will say that on this point a very decided majority of the committee concurred in the section.

To the second section I wish to invite the careful and earnest attention of the Senate. This section is an honest effort to deal with the great problem of redemption. Every Senator who has spoken contemplates that a time must come when all the United States notes must be redeemed in coin. The public faith of the United States is so pledged. The notes were issued with the understanding that they should be paid in coin. No man could survive politically in this country who would declare that it was his purpose never to pay these notes in coin. My friend who now presides [Mr. FERRY, of Michigan] speaks always of his measure of inflation as a means of bringing about at some time specie payments; and I will say that in the Senate I have not heard any Senator deny that it is the duty of the United States at some time to pay these notes in coin. In all this discussion there is at least that one point agreed upon. If I state this too strongly I hope I will be here corrected.

Now, Mr. President, how shall it be done, and when shall it be done? I say that now, nine years after the close of our civil war, twelve years after these notes have been authorized and issued, five years after the dominant party has declared its purpose to pay them at the earliest day practicable, there should be no longer delay. The United States ought to do something toward the fulfillment of that pledge and the performance of that duty. There must be something very peculiar in the condition of our country that will justify a longer delay, a longer procrastination in the performance of this solemn pledge, this public policy—our own political obligation.

Mr. President, this section is the result of the patient consideration of the Committee on Finance as to how this result is to be brought about; and upon this very section there is most likely to be a contrariety and difference of opinion among Senators, because the mode and manner of redemption is the thing which has excited the public mind and upon which men all over the country differ. I wish therefore to deal with this question. We have got to pay these notes in coin. The time when is not defined by the law. Are we prepared now to fix a day when we will pay these notes in coin? If the condition of our country was such as to justify it, I would greatly prefer fixing the time when these notes should be paid in coin; but I am disposed to agree with what has been stated by the Senator from Indiana and by other Senators, that in the present condition of our coinage, the present condition of our foreign trade, we are not prepared to fix a definite day when we will pay in coin. Why? I find by reference to official documents that we now have in gold and silver coin in this country about $140,000,000. This statement of Dr. Linderman does not include the bullion on hand. How much that is I am not prepared to state. The whole amount of gold and silver coin in the country, however, is about $140,000,000. Some of that is in circulation in the Pacific States, but the bulk of it is in the Treasury of the United States, the property of individuals and the property of the United States. The total annual production of gold and silver in this country cannot be estimated at over $70,000,000; and heretofore at least fifty millions of this has been exported over and above the amount that has been imported. The balance of trade has been against us; and although I do not regard that as entering much into the calculation, yet it is a fact that until recently perhaps the balance of trade has been against us. The annual coinage of the United States for the last year or two has been largely increasing, and last year the coinage of the United States was $38,689,183, besides a stamping into fine bars, which operates as a kind of coinage, of $27,517,000. So that there has been in fact converted of gold and silver into coin or bars stamped by the United States $66,000,000 during the last year, showing a use and employment of gold in this country that is now rapidly increasing.

But still this state of affairs would not justify us in saying that we are prepared to declare a resumption of specie payments absolutely upon the basis of $300,000,000 of paper money, including our fractional currency. I am, therefore, not prepared to say that the United States can on a fixed day, within a reasonable time—within such a time as would give confidence in our ability to perform it—say that we will absolutely redeem our notes in coin.

I know that Senators here, for whose opinion I have the highest respect, who are probably more sanguine of our ability and capacity to do this than I am—many of those who have agreed with me and co-operated with me—think we are able and strong enough to fix the time for the absolute resumption of specie payments; but I have always doubted it. Indeed I have thought there was a better way to reach the great result. But if we cannot fix the time when we will redeem in coin, can we not give additional value to our United States notes, so as to gradually appreciate them to the coin standard, and thus advance toward specie payments if we cannot reach the goal? Because we cannot accomplish all that we have agreed to do in a given time, does that relieve us from the necessity of progressing in that direction? When we have before us a long journey that will take months to pass, perhaps years, shall we delay starting on that journey because we cannot reach the end of it in a year or two? Not at all. I therefore say that the time has arrived this moment when the United States ought to do something to advance its notes to the specie standard.

Now what is that something? There are two propositions, and only two propositions, that have been made aside from absolute coin redemption, that have had any strength whatever. One is to allow the United States notes to be received in payment of customs duties, the other is to allow United States notes to be converted into bonds. In regard to the first, I agree entirely that if the matter was open now to our choice and selection, one of the best methods we could adopt to advance our notes to par in gold would be by repealing that restriction which prevents the receiving of them for customs duties; but we are met there by the sacred pledge of the United States; we are met there by the fact that customs duties are by the law of 1862 agreed to be collected in coin.

Mr. BAYARD. Does not the law provide that the customs duties shall be paid in coin or in notes of the United States? Is not the alternative given by the law?

Mr. SHERMAN. O, no. If the Senator will look at section 5 of the act of February 25, 1862—my friend from Vermont can turn to it in a moment—he will find that there is an express stipulation that the customs duties shall be collected in coin, and that this coin shall be set aside as a pledge—legal language is used—and shall only be applied, first, to the payment of the interest on the public debt, and secondly to the establishment of a sinking fund of 1 per cent. That was the basis of the obligation of the United States to pay in coin; and but for the fact that we collected our customs duties in coin during the war we could not have paid the interest on our public debt in coin, and therefore our bonds would have sunk out of sight. That pledge we cannot now violate; and I never have yet been able to bring my mind to the consideration of any proposition whatever which would even shock or excite the fear of the public creditors in that respect. The safety of the public creditors consists in having a specific fund for the payment of their interest; the principal will take care of itself; and that fund has always been maintained in the darkest hours of the war. Except the propositions that have been made here and there to impair that fund by allowing a portion of the customs duties to be paid in currency, it has never been either invaded or threatened; but all such propositions have been voted down. I therefore, while I see the policy and the expediency of allowing these notes to be used in payment of customs duties, simply say we are precluded from that remedy because we have mortgaged that fund, and we have no power to take them for any purpose except that which the mortgage stipulates.

Then we come to the next proposition.

Mr. THURMAN. If my colleague will allow me, I wish to inquire of him whether the fact is not that the amount of gold received from customs duties has been, until the panic commenced, much larger than the amount of interest we pay, and whether there is any pledge of the gold received from the customs duties beyond the amount necessary to pay the interest on the public debt and the sinking fund?

Mr. SHERMAN. I can state to my colleague that there is, and has been, an overplus, and therefore we have sold the gold. The amount of the interest of the debt is about $100,000,000 per annum, or a little more. The sinking fund is now $30,000,000 in round numbers; and then, besides that, there are the expenses of foreign intercourse, the expenses of the Navy on foreign coasts, &c., and certain other expenses that have necessarily to be paid in gold, say to the amount of $6,000,000. We have then $136,000,000 of gold expenditure, and our gold revenue cannot now be counted upon surely this year at more than $180,000,000. As a matter of course, we may do what we please with the excess of gold above these stipulated sums, but it only amounts to less than one-fourth of the aggregate revenue; and therefore to propose to allow the notes to the amount of one-fourth to be received for customs duties would only be another mode of selling the gold which would be otherwise received and give no practical relief. It would only be pro tanto a reduction of the duties on foreign goods. Therefore, I have never regarded the various propositions on this subject as practicable; certainly not to the extent of more than thirty or forty million dollars.

We then come to the redemption in bonds. There is the moral obligation on the part of the United States, which has issued its notes payable in coin, but for reasons of public policy does not pay in coin, to give to its creditors its notes bearing interest in place of coin. The United States cannot plead inability to pay interest on its notes if it will not or cannot pay the principal. Why should not the United States give its obligation bearing interest just as any individual would have to do? There is a moral obligation which rests upon the United States every day of the year to every holder of these notes, because, although the United States has not said when it will redeem these notes in coin, yet it is bound to do what it can to give them additional value. Although it may not receive these notes for customs duties, why can it not receive these notes in payment of bonds? Why discriminate against these notes in the sale of bonds? The answer is, that during the war we were compelled to do it; and so we were. I very reluctantly yielded to that necessity. We were compelled to do it; but, sir, it was only expected that that would continue to the close of the war; and, practically, during the whole of the war these notes were received at par for bonds at par.

If, therefore, we are to take any step toward specie payments, why not give to the holder of United States notes who demands it a bond of the United States bearing a reasonable rate of interest in exchange for his notes? This should only be done after a reasonable time, so as to prevent any injury to the private contracts between debtor and creditor. When we cannot pay the coin, we are honorably and sacredly bound to pay in a bond of the United States, which in ordinary times would approximate to par in gold. In other words, this is a qualified redemption. The Senator from Indiana calls it a "half-way measure." It is a half-way measure in the right direction, and indeed it is practical specie payment.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question right there in reference to these bonds? I do not wish to disturb the Senator in his argument.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will hear the Senator.

Mr. LOGAN. Providing a 5 per cent. gold-bearing bond payable in ten years, as I understand this bill does, would produce $200,000,000 in ten years as interest, which would make the amount of money payable by the people to redeem the $400,000,000, $600,000,000 in gold.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not understand the question. Will the Senator repeat it?

Mr. LOGAN. The question is, whether or not you believe that the Government will not be able to redeem the greenbacks, if anybody wants them redeemed, within the next ten years? If they are, these bonds which you propose to issue are only redeemable in ten years; but when the people have to redeem the bonds at the expiration of ten years, they will have to redeem $400,000,000 of greenbacks, and in addition will have to pay $200,000,000 of gold for interest, making $600,000,000 for the redemption of $400,000,000 of greenbacks.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is, it costs more to pay a man with interest than without interest.

Mr. LOGAN. It costs the people $200,000,000, taking the chance that in ten years the Government will not be able to pay this sum of $400,000,000. Is not that the result?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think, if a man has my note without interest for ten years, it is a great deal better for me, and a great deal worse for him, than if he has my note bearing 5 per cent., payable every year. If that is the point the Senator makes, undoubtedly that is true. It is better in one sense, that it is less burdensome to the United States to have its note outstanding without interest than it is to pay interest.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to disturb the Senator further; but that is not the point I suggested. My point is this: that redeeming the bonds and making the bonds run ten years is a presumption on our part, if we agree to that, that the Government will be able at the end of ten years to redeem the bonds and pay 5 per cent. interest on them. If the Government at the end of ten years is able to redeem bonds that are drawing 5 per cent. gold interest all the time, will not the Government at the end of ten years be just as able to redeem the greenbacks without the bonds?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state that the bonds contemplated by this act are the same bonds now authorized by law; that is, the ten-forty bonds, payable at the end of ten years, at the pleasure of the United States within forty years. There is nothing new about it. We simply take the old bonds because they are convenient.

Not only is this founded on strong obligation, but there are precedents for it without number, not only in this country, but in all countries. I will say that until July 1, 1863, the Government of the United States never, in its whole history, refused to take its outstanding notes in payment of its bonds at par, and never, until the close of the war, did it refuse practically to do the like. Why, sir, the basis of the plan of Alexander Hamilton was the conversion of all forms of obligations into certain prescribed bonds of the United States. It was in that way, and with the aid of the United States Bank, that specie payments were brought about. Why, sir, the money of the Revolution, the old continental money, which had depreciated and died out of sight, was funded into the new securities, or converted, to use the modern language, at the rate of one hundred to one. All the various forms of securities of the Colonies, of the thirteen different States, and all the various obligations of the United States, all the forms of currency that prevailed in the times of our revolutionary fathers, were funded, converted into certain forms of bonds, and those rapidly rose to par in gold; so that in three years it was said of Alexander Hamilton, "He smote the rock of the national resources and abundant streams of revenue gushed forth; he touched the dead corpse of the public credit, and it sprang upon its feet." In three years a condition of absolute bankruptcy became a condition of great and growing prosperity.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to ask the Senator if there is not a difference between the funding system suggested in this second section and the funding system of Alexander Hamilton in this: that when heretofore governments have exchanged their interest-paying obligations for their current indebtedness, the current indebtedness has been wiped out, paid; whereas, under the operation of this second section, the current indebtedness is still going to continue, but the bonded debt is going to be added to it?

Mr. SHERMAN. I would have answered that in a later portion of my remarks. That is the argument made in regard to the reissue of these notes. When a man presents a note to the United States for a bond and the Government gives him that bond, the obligation to the holder of that note is then discharged. It is not fully discharged, because a full discharge would demand the payment in coin; but the best practicable mode of discharging that obligation to the holder of the note is to give him a bond bearing interest, practically equivalent to gold. Then the note is the property of the United States; the note is the note of the United States paid off, and it may be reissued, as is done every day. Why not? If you were to authorize the conversion of these notes on demand into bonds without the power to reissue, you would suddenly cramp and cripple the business interests of the country, which you ought not to do. Suppose you redeem the note in coin, could you not pay it out again? What impropriety is there in that? Why not pay it out again? And so when the note is presented for a bond and the United States redeem it with a bond, may not the United States issue that note again at its pleasure under the authority given by the original act? There is no doubt of it at all, unless it is prohibited by subsequent law. As to the policy of doing it, I will come to that in a few moments.

Now a word as to the reason why the 5 per cent. is taken rather than any other. We are here met with a multitude of counter-propositions, some of which are pending in the House of Representatives, that instead of allowing the conversion into a 5 per cent. bond, we allow the conversion into a 3.65 per cent. bond. Why not? Is it not better to give a bond bearing a lower rate of interest than a bond bearing a higher rate of interest? Certainly, if such a conversion will accomplish the same results.

Mr. BOGY. Permit me to ask the Senator a question before he comes to that point, and that is, as to the right to convert the greenbacks into a bond and then the right to reissue the greenbacks. What gain will there be to the Government if this thing is carried on? Suppose you redeem $1,000 in greenbacks by the issue of a 5 per cent. bond. The necessities of the Government will soon require a reissue of those legal-tenders again, according to the Senator's argument. It is so provided in the law.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will only wait until I come to that point, I will answer him.

The reason why 5 per cent. bonds are taken rather than 3.65 per cent. bonds is that the 5 per cent. bond can be maintained at par in gold. It is at par in gold now, and for seventy years of our history a 5 per cent. bond of the United States has sold in the money markets of the world at par in gold. The price or value of that bond is not fixed here; it is not fixed in New York; but it is fixed in the money markets of the world. Now suppose you substitute for the 5 per cent. bond the 3.65 per cent. bond, what would that bond be worth in the market? That would fix the value of the greenback. The greenback being convertible into this bond, it would fix the value of the greenback; and we know practically that a bond bearing 3.65 per cent. interest in gold would not be worth more than from seventy to seventy-five cents on the dollar. Therefore by such a measure as has been proposed we would at once reduce the value of the greenback rather than increase it. The result would be either that the notes would not be converted into 3.65 per cent. bonds, for the greenbacks would be considerably more valuable as currency; or, on the other hand, they would be depreciated to the standard of the 3.65 per cent. bond. The 5 per cent. bond is taken because that can be and is at ordinary times at par in gold; and therefore it is practically a gold resumption.

Now as to the power to reissue these notes, as a matter of course that is a matter of detail. I should dislike exceedingly to see that power denied to the United States. If Senators desire to test the question as to the power to reissue, if my friend from Missouri thinks no advantage will be gained by the Government in the power to reissue, let him test that question. But now what is the effect of this power to reissue? When a man has the power to convert his note into a bond bearing 5 per cent. and practically at par with gold, it raises the value of that note to that standard undoubtedly. A thing that may be converted into another will always be of the same value. My friend from Massachusetts in an able argument that he made the other day talked about "equivalents." I think that is an equivalent when one thing can be turned into another; they are the equivalents of each other for all practical purposes. He criticised the word "equivalent," as if there was something very strange or singular in it. Equivalents are defined in the dictionary to be things that are exchanged for each other. As a matter of course both parties think they gain an advantage, or they will not make the exchange. But the law, the common sense, calls them equivalents because one is taken for the other. One article may be desired by one man, and something else by another, and they exchange; and that is the basis of barter, the basis of sales, the basis of all contracts.

When a note or a certain quantity of notes can be converted into a bond bearing 5 per cent. interest, then those notes have the market value of that bond; and in practice what would be the effect? What is the effect in specie-paying times? A bank with $10,000 or $50,000 of gold can maintain in circulation from $400,000 to $500,000. Although every holder of these notes knows very well that there would not be money enough in the bank to pay even one-fourth of them, yet they pass ordinarily current for gold, and not more than 1 or 2 per cent. of them are presented in the year. Experience has shown that banks do not redeem in coin even in prosperous times or in any times more than 1, 2, or 3 per cent. in a whole year. When they are called upon to redeem, they generally redeem by exchanges or in some other form.

Now, therefore, when you fix the convertible power of the greenback into a bond, you fix the value of that note, and practically this process of presenting the note for redemption will very rarely occur. What then? How many of these notes will be presented for redemption before the difference between the note and the bond will disappear? Why, sir, I never yet among business men have heard it estimated as higher than ten or twelve or thirteen millions. The right to convert always establishes the value, and the right will not be exercised. Let me tell Senators who fear that the whole of the notes will be converted into bonds what actually occurred in 1863. In January, 1863, Secretary Chase came to Congress and asked us to repeal this right to convert them, provided for by law, on the ground that the very existence of that right which might be exercised at any time actually prevented conversion; and that is usually the effect of such a right. I say, therefore, that, fixing the value of the note at the price of the bond, the process of conversion and reconversion will not often occur.

But my friend from Missouri points to the fact that these notes will be reissued, and he asks, what benefit does the Government derive from this process? Why, sir, it derives the benefit of performing its obligations; the same benefit that every debtor derives when he pays an honest debt according to its stipulations. But the Government may lose interest. Certainly it may lose interest. Why should not a debtor lose interest when he owes a debt and does not pay it? But why reserve the right to reissue these notes? Because we have uses for them. We may pay the ordinary expenses of the Government with them. The Senator describes this as a process which will increase the public debt. It is not possible to increase the public debt under the operation of this section——

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion at this point?

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather not just at this moment. The Senator interrupts me right in the middle of a sentence, and I have almost forgotten what I was saying. I was trying to answer the objections made by the Senator from Missouri. Why should not the Government reserve that right? The purposes for which these notes are issued are defined fully. But he says they may be used to pay current expenses. So they may. It would be difficult to distinguish between funds that come into the Treasury for bonds and those that come in from the ordinary revenues of the Government. But does not the Senator remember that the current revenues of the Government are and ought to be, and always have been, equal to the payment of the ordinary expenses, and always in excess of that amount? Does the Senator wish to guard against the possible contingency of Congress failing to levy taxes enough to pay the current expenses? While this money may be paid out for current expenses, another stream pours in. Here is the Treasury with many streams of revenue from all quarters pouring in and others going out. As a matter of course the current revenues will always supply the vacuum caused by the payment of the current expenses, leaving the notes received for bonds to be paid out for other bonds.

What bonds may be paid with these notes? They may be applied to the payment of the five-twenty bonds. But it may be asked, how? We have outstanding now $1,200,000,000 of bonds that are due to-day which we have the right to pay in coin at par. They bear six per cent. interest. They are worth now a great deal more than gold, because we have not the coin to pay them and no means of getting the coin.

But what is the theory of this section? The 5 per cent. bonds are practically at or near par in gold to-day. All during the panic they were worth not less than ninety-nine cents on the dollar. In the very darkest hours of the panic these 5 per cent. bonds of ours were worth ninety-nine cents in gold. Then these notes received by us in payment of the bonds are worth ninety-nine cents in gold. If there should be a time of great ease in the money market, when money was lying idle, it would be presented for coin or bonds. In this way ten, twenty, or even thirty millions might accumulate in the Treasury. But how long would this process continue before the demand for currency would put a stop to this redemption or conversion? The withdrawal of a few millions temporarily from the volume of currency outstanding among the people would always bring back the normal state of affairs. The Secretary of the Treasury could then use the notes in his possession in payment of 6 per cent. bonds of the United States. How? Not by compelling the holder of the 6 per cent. bonds to take the notes, but he can buy gold always, and the difference between the value of these notes and the gold would not ordinarily be over 1 per cent., probably not that, and in this way he can pay par for par, or at a discount not exceeding 1 per cent., the 6 per cent. bonds of the United States.

Here is a use that may go on day after day and year after year, which would absorb $1,200,000,000 of these notes; a use in which the Government of the United States would derive the profit from paying off a 6 per cent. bond and issuing a 5 per cent. bond. Why, sir, the process of what is known as the syndicate has been going on at an expense of 2 per cent., and this process, that might go on by the voluntary ordinary ebbs and flows of the Treasury Department, without commissions or agencies or aids, may convert the whole of your 6 per cent. bonds, as these notes come into the Treasury, into 5 per cent. bonds, and thus save the people of the United States $12,000,000 in gold a year. How fast this process will go on will depend entirely on how rapidly the notes may be presented for conversion. If notes are presented rapidly for conversion into 5 per cent. bonds, and can be thus used, every part of this plan would operate to the benefit of the people of the United States.

At one time I thought of reading a number of letters from eminent bankers, men who are well known all over the United States, to show that the practical effect of this would be that these notes having the right to be converted into bonds would at once stand on an equality with bonds. I proposed to refer specially to one, known to most Senators here, but I do not like to drag private names in here, who said that he would guarantee with $10,000,000 a year to redeem every note presented without any hesitation, because a right always existing would rarely be exercised. It would never be exercised except in the case of a very full money market, when money was lying idle, and people might be willing to convert their notes into bonds with the hope that afterward they might sell the bonds in the money market, and get the notes back again for circulation, and in the mean time the Government that issues its 5 per cent. bonds and receives the notes may use these very notes in the payment of the public debt.

Now I will hear the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MORTON. I was going to call the attention of my friend from Ohio to the effect of this section in connection with the last section of this bill:

That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize any increase of the principal of the public debt of the United States.

This second section provides:

And the Secretary of the Treasury may reissue the United States notes so received, or, if they are canceled, may issue United States notes to the same amount, either to purchase or redeem the public debt, or to meet the current payments for the public service.

I suggest to my friend that that part is nullified by the last section, because if they are reissued to meet current expenses they do increase the public debt precisely to that amount. The notes are a part of the public debt. If fifty millions are brought in and converted into 5 per cent. bonds, fifty millions of bonded debt are created. Then if the notes are reissued in payment of public expenses, there is fifty millions of public debt in the form of notes, and the public debt has been increased fifty millions. Therefore the last section of the bill nullifies that part of the second section which the Senator has been considering.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator had waited until I commented upon the sixth section of the bill he would have seen precisely my answer, and if he will allow me now, rather than interrupt my argument, I will show him that by no possibility under the operation of this bill can the public debt be increased; and to avoid the very criticism now made, the sixth section was put in, which, undoubtedly, will prevent it. Perhaps I had better now state the reason. As a matter of course, when these notes flow into the Treasury and a bond is issued in place of them, there is no increase of the public debt in that operation.

Mr. MORTON. No, sir; not that far.

Mr. SHERMAN. When the United States notes are paid out in liquidation or payment of five-twenty bonds, there is no increase.

Mr. MORTON. No.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is manifest. Then the only possible increase can be in a possible condition of a deficiency in the revenue; that is, where the amount flowing into the Treasury from the ordinary revenues is less than the amount of current expenses. That presumes that Congress will fail to do its duty. It presumes that Congress will fail to levy taxes to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government. It is a contingency scarcely worth while to guard against. But suppose Congress does neglect to provide means to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government, are they not to be paid?

Mr. MORTON. That would increase the public debt, and that is forbidden by the last section.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; then suppose that the last section would prevent the operation of that second section at a time which only occurs once in twenty or thirty years, does the Senator object to that? No, sir; this section was put in to guard against just such arguments as may be made. We know that in the ordinary course of affairs Congress will provide by law for enough revenue to pay the current expenses of the Government. It is scarcely necessary for us to provide against a contingency when it will not. Why, sir, lately when there was a slight deficiency for a few months, it alarmed the whole country, and Congress was called upon to levy taxes, and would have levied taxes but for the fact that the improving condition of the revenue led many members of the House of Representatives to think it not necessary. I think they may levy them yet before the close of the present session. It is a question that we have nothing to do with; but it is to be presumed that Congress will do its duty and furnish the means to defray the ordinary expenses of the Government; but if it does not, what next? We must go in debt, and that is all; and to the extent of the deficiency in the revenue we would increase the public debt. We would do it, any way; and the only question would be whether it would be in the form of 5 per cent. bonds or in the form of unpaid requisitions upon the Treasury Department.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to know what the meaning of this sixth section is:

That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize any increase of the principal of the public debt of the United States.

The public debt at what time? Now or at any time?

Mr. SHERMAN. As a matter of course that would not prevent Congress from passing new loan bills; but it means simply that under the operation of this act the public debt shall not be increased; and, as I showed a moment ago, there is no possibility of an increase of the public debt, except to pay a deficiency in the current revenues, and probably this sixth section might prevent the operation of the second section in that particular case.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The point I want to get at is, what that section meant; whether it was that this act should not operate to increase the amount of the public debt as it was at the passage of this act, or as it might be reduced at any time.

Mr. SHERMAN. My impression is that the fair construction of the section (although, as I did not write it, I would rather some other gentleman would explain the meaning of it) is that the provisions of this act shall not lead to an increase of the public debt, either now or at any time; that if the public debt is to be increased it must be by some other law or authority.

Mr. LOGAN. If that is the construction, if the Senator will allow me right there, I should like to put this question to him——

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope my friend will allow me to go on.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course I will, if the Senator does not yield to allow me to ask a question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust Senators will not interrupt me further. I have been very patient. Owing to these interruptions I have consumed more time now than I intended. When I spoke once before on this subject, I was put under the catechism for some hours.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suppose that is the true construction given by the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. President, if this section contains any defects, or if on account of the intrinsic difficulties of this problem, this plan of redemption seems faulty or objectionable, I ask Senators this simple question, and I put it to the conscience of every man: If this plan does not meet your view, will you not suggest another? Will you adjourn this Congress with an increase of both national and bank-currency without any plan of redemption, without any promise of redemption, without any hope of redemption, all your promises broken, your pledges dishonored, your country dishonored, as I say it will be when you provide for the issue of more paper money in the face of the pledges you have made without any plan of redemption or reduction of the existing debt? Senators, face your responsibilities. If you do not like this plan, suggest some other, and I will then make the comparison of this one with any which you may suggest. Do you propose to redeem these notes in coin? That is fair and honorable and square, I concede. Will you make no provision whatever for the redemption of these notes? Why not? Are you not rich enough to do it? Is not the United States rich enough to advance $382,000,000 of notes to par in gold? With the overflowing wealth of this country, with $32,000,000,000 of property, with an annual income amounting to about $6,000,000,000, with forty millions of the most prosperous people in the world, and with our boundless resources and great country, are we not able to bring our notes to par in gold? Why, sir, we flaunt the star-splangled banner in the face of the world and point to ourselves as the model republic, as an evidence of the effect of free institutions upon a hearty, hardy, intelligent, and virtuous people; and yet we express our inability to pay our broken promises, our inability even to suggest a mode by which or a time when those promises shall be fulfilled.

Mr. President, I desire Senators to bring that question home to themselves. Let them not come forward and say, with the Senator from Indiana, this is not the time to redeem any promises, it is not the time to even say when we will do so; that the country is under a fright. When I hear this talk about the recent panic, I always think of the old nursery rhyme of "Henny-penny, Cockie-lockie, Goosie-poosie, and Turkey-lurkey," who were frightened by the falling of pease from the vines they were pecking, and started the alarm, "The sky is falling, the sky is falling; let us go and tell the king." According to my recollection of the story, they all got together in the fox's hole and were devoured before they reached the king.

The recent panic has been made the reason and the cause of a great many extravagant ideas. I speak now in all kindness to others. The panic was simply an abuse of credit; it was simply the engagement of men in great enterprises beyond their reach, and when they failed, it destroyed confidence. It is this want of confidence that ties up money in the cities and makes money scarce in the country; but the wealth of our country is unimpaired; its resources are unimpaired. Everything a man has to sell will sell as it did before. Prices are maintained with the single exception of cotton. What is the price of cotton now compared with what it was last year?

Mr. FLANAGAN. About a cent lower.

Mr. SHERMAN. About a cent lower, I am told. The ordinary prices in the country in which I live are rather higher. The panic is no evidence of want of prosperity; but the men who involved themselves too far in debt want to be saved by depreciating the standard by which labor and property are measured. Therefore, when Senators come to criticise the plan proposed by the committee, that looks to the resumption of specie payments, let them suggest some other, unless they still are under the influence of the panic; unless they believe we are so utterly bankrupt as to be unable to make any provision for the redemption of our notes either in coin or in bonds, or in any other way.

As to the time when this shall occur, upon that point I am very indifferent. I believe the country could do it on the 1st day of January next, because the change that would be made in the relative value of the greenback now and then would not be greater than has occurred in any one year in the last five years of our history. But the Committee on Finance thought it was better to put it off a year and a half. The effect would be somewhat diminished if it was put off two years and a half, until the 1st of January, 1877. But what I insist upon is that we should not increase the currency under any circumstances unless we provide a time when, and a mode by which, we will advance these notes to par in gold or towards the specie standard. Sir, in this country we never took six months to resume specie payments. We had revulsions in 1857, in 1847, and in 1837, and specie payments were resumed by the solvent banks in every case within a year. We do not want the time fixed; but if Senators are afraid that the operation of this bill is too rapid, that the mode of redemption is too prompt, let them suggest an extension of the time; let us maintain the promise and provide for some mode and means by which we will redeem that promise in a reasonable time. All I ask is that the Government shall not turn its back upon the policy it has always stood upon of looking to a specie standard, but that now in connection with measures to provide local currency for the country we may renew that promise and declare when and how we will fulfill it.

Now, Mr. President, I ask for the reading of the third section.

Mr. MORTON. Before the Senator passes from that will he allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, a great deal has been said about the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue the $44,000,000 reserve. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to this provision of the second section:

> And the Secretary of the Treasury may reissue the United States notes so received, or, if they are canceled, may issue United States notes to the same amount, either to purchase or redeem the public debt, or to meet the current payments for the public service.

This provision leaves it discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury whether he will reissue any of the notes that may be converted into the 5 per cent. bonds. If from any cause he thinks it is improper or unwise to reissue them, or to invest them in bonds, or to pay them out for ordinary expenses, he has a right to withhold them; and that is to contract the currency indefinitely, because under this section all the legal-tender notes may be funded into 5 per cent. bonds, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized in his discretion to retain them all in the Treasury. He is not compelled to pay them out for bonds or for any other cause unless he thinks proper.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Secretary of the Treasury undoubtedly has some discretion under this bill, but no discretion compared with that of issuing any amount, even a million dollars of irredeemable paper money. Here this money is presented to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he can only issue the bond when somebody demands it. But the Senator says he may accumulate this money in the Treasury, and that there is a dangerous discretion. Well, sir, he may do it now under the law. He can accumulate every dollar he receives under the law. There is no law which requires the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out all the money that is received into the Treasury, and this bill makes no difference in the law. It must necessarily be so. It is sufficient to say that Secretaries of the Treasury in this country are subject to public opinion, and when the Secretary of the Treasury would bring us up near to par in gold and would not pay out this money, public opinion would at once correct it, and Congress would always be here in a reasonable time to guard, regulate, control, and limit that discretion, if we deemed it necessary. It is sufficient to say now that this gives him no discretion beyond what he has this day in regard to all the revenues of the United States. There is no law now to prevent him from accumulating ten, fifty, or a hundred million dollars in greenbacks. He may, under the law, which the Senator voted for, sell every dollar of gold in the Treasury and put it all in greenbacks and keep it in his vaults. He has full power to do it; but he will not do it because it is to be supposed that a man occupying the high position of Secretary of the Treasury will have some sense; and that is generally to be presumed.

Now, Mr. President, I will ask for the reading of the third section.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, before he comes to that I wish to make one remark with reference to the second section. I intended to ask the chairman of the committee a few moments ago a question in reference to his construction of the two sections. Construing the sixth section in connection with the other sections, he said he thought the proper construction would be that the Secretary of the Treasury would not have a right to increase the public debt at any time, as I understood him. Now, let me put a case to him. Suppose this bill should become a law, this sixth section providing that the Secretary of the Treasury shall not have the right to increase the public debt at any time, he would then under the provisions of this bill, because he is authorized to do so, purchase Government bonds to the mount of $500,000,000. He thereby reduces the public debt by the amount of $500,000,000, we will say, on the 1st of May next. It is provided here that he may do so.

Mr. SHERMAN. By the purchase of five-twenty bonds.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly; that is what I said. Suppose on the 1st of May he purchases ten or fifty millions. Then on that day the public debt is reduced ten or fifty millions, as the case may be. Then he attempts the next day to redeem the notes that he has purchased the five-twenty bonds with, by the reissue of 5 per cent. ten-year bonds. Is not that an increase of the public debt?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I do not understand this system.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is not increasing the public debt one dollar over what it is now.

Mr. President, I prefer to go on with my remarks, because Senators must see, especially when such questions are interposed, that they prolong the debate very much.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not intend to prolong the debate; but my friend from Wisconsin suggests to me that probably the Senator misunderstood my question from my manner of stating it. I understand the construction of the Senator to be that the Secretary could not increase the public debt at any time, and I ask this question: if he reduces the public debt at any time can he then increase it again?

Mr. SHERMAN. The whole operation of this section is simply the exchange of one form of debt for another.

Mr. LOGAN. I understood that precisely.

Mr. SHERMAN. If he receives in the greenbacks and pays out a 5 per cent. bond, or if he pays out the greenbacks and receives in a 6 per cent. bond, it is only the exchange of one debt for another. I trustthat now my friend will allow me to go on.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly; but I understand the difference between the bonded debt of the Government, according to the Secretary of the Treasury, and other debts, and it certainly does increase the bonded indebtedness, if I can understand anything about this matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. The word "bonded" is not there.

Mr. LOGAN. It is "public debt."

Mr. SHERMAN. The greenbacks we still regard as a part of the public debt. We have not yet been converted into the idea that they are not a debt.

Now, I ask for the reading of the third section of the bill.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 3. That national banking associations may be organized in any State or Territory, including the District of Columbia, having a less proportion of national-bank circulation than the State of New York, according to the apportionment made upon the basis of population and wealth by the annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1873, until each State and Territory and said District, respectively, has an amount of such bank circulation equal to such proportion of notes then outstanding in the State of New York; and all banks organized under this section shall be subject to, and be governed by, the rules, restrictions, and limitations, and possess the rights, privileges, and franchises, now, or hereafter to be, prescribed by law as to national banking associations, with the same power to amend, alter, and repeal provided by the "national-currency act," approved June 3, 1864; and section 6 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, be, and is hereby, repealed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I give fair notice to Senators that I am getting a little fatigued, and I trust they will not interrupt me in my further statement of the provisions of this bill; and I shall consider myself at liberty now to decline to be further interrupted.

The third section of the bill is intended to provide for free banking; to remove all limitations, except as I shall state them, from the right of any individual under the banking law to organize a bank and issue currency, upon the deposit of United States bonds, in all respects according to the provisions of the general banking law. But in framing this section it was suggested, and the argument was made with great force in the Senate by Senators on both sides, that if you allow free banking the present inequality of distribution of bank circulation, which has been made the cause of so much local complaint, would be increased rather than diminished; that the people of the New England and Eastern States, having a superabundance of capital, might avail themselves of the provisions of the free-banking law and rush into the banking system, increase the amount of currency in this way, and thus really prevent the organization of banks in the West and South, and increase the inequality that is already complained of. There is a great deal of force in this.

While the idea of free banking is a very popular one, and a very right one, and while it is very difficult to define the metes and bounds or the place where a bank should be organized, or give a reason for preventing men from organizing banks wherever they choose, yet it is palpable that to maintain this national-bank system, to make it popular, to make it convenient to all parts of the country, it must be localized and spread fairly all over the country. That was the original design of the act, which was defeated, as I have said, by what I claim to be an erroneous construction of the law. Therefore it was that the suggestion was made that we adopt some standard for bank circulation sufficiently high to give every State South and West all they wanted; and as New York is the great State of the country, having more than $2,000,000 more than her share, it was finally deemed that New York was the best to adopt as a standard. The reason was this: It was admitted on all hands that in New York they had enough of this kind of currency; they were actually winding up some of their banks and changing them into State institutions, and therefore New York was taken as the maximum; and within the limits of the amount now allowed to the State of New York any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, may organize free banking.

I desire to say for myself, that while these ideas were assented to by me, I am perfectly willing to run the risk of free banking. The only objection to it is that the Eastern States, with their superabundance of capital, with the fact that they have the bonds on hand, may rush into this system and keep up this inequality that has been complained of so much as a local grievance. I do not see any other reason for this provision than this: that it will secure and perhaps induce a flow of capital from New England, New York, and the Eastern States, where it is abundant, to the southward and westward, where, on account of the war and on account of the sparseness of the population they are comparatively poor, and induce the organization of banks there.

So far as free banking is concerned, I have always been in favor of it. The limitation of $300,000,000 put upon the banking act was supposed to be beyond what would ever be required. The fact that that limit has been exceeded shows the strength and popularity of the system. When we organized the national banks in 1863 the total amount of bank paper then outstanding was less than $200,000,000, including all the Southern States. We supposed when we limited the aggregate of circulation to $300,000,000 that we had provided amply sufficient. There is no reason why any particular limit should be put on the amount of bank circulation except only that it is redeemable, and there can be no proper limit to the amount of any kind of paper money except that it shall be kept and maintained at par in gold. Therefore this proposition to repeal and strike down the present limitation meets my hearty assent; and I am utterly indifferent, so far as this bill is concerned, whether it be absolute free banking, giving to all the States the same right to organize banks, or whether it be limited in this way to States that have now less than their share.

Every State, under the operation of this bill, will receive additional circulation if they want it, except only the New England States, and perhaps some of them will receive some, and New York, and perhaps Pennsylvania, and perhaps New Jersey. I am not sure that they have more than their proportion. All the other States will have some, of course. The increase provided for by this section may amount to from $100,000,000 to $110,000,000.

I now ask the Secretary to read the fourth section of the bill, which presents, in my judgment, the most difficult part of this whole proposition.

The Secretary read section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. That within thirty days after circulating notes to the amount of $1,000,000 shall be issued to national banking associations under the preceding section, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retire an amount of United States notes equal to 70 per cent. of the circulating notes so issued, which shall be in further reduction of the volume of $382,000,000 fixed by the preceding section; and such reduction shall continue until the aggregate amount of United States notes outstanding shall be $300,000,000. And for that purpose he is authorized to issue and sell at public sale, after ten days' notice of the time and place of sale, a sufficient amount of the bonds of the United States, of the character and description prescribed in the second section of this act, for United States notes to be then retired and canceled.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, this section was again another compromise, and, like all compromises, it may not be entirely satisfactory to any one. It was felt that we ought not to increase national-bank notes beyond the limit now allowed by law without retiring some other form of circulation; because while it has been contended on this floor that the issue of bank circulation does not inflate the currency to the same extent that the issue of greenbacks does, yet all have admitted that the issue of bank circulation, while it is irredeemable, inconvertible, and depreciated, in any form, by swelling the volume, does tend to depreciate it. Greenbacks being legal tenders and the basis of the redemption of bank-notes, the issue of them directly depreciates the value of those already issued; while bank-notes, being redeemable in greenbacks, being secured by Government bonds, have the same effect only as long as neither greenbacks nor bank-notes are redeemable.

If the United States notes were redeemable either in coin or bonds, the reduction of United States notes would not be material, because then the standard of redemption being maintained practically at par in gold, it would make no difference whether or not you retired the greenbacks under the provisions of this section. But it is only while these notes are irredeemable, while they are depreciated, while they are inconvertible, that it is necessary to guard against the inflation of the currency and a depreciation of the whole volume by the increase of bank circulation. At present, in our present condition, the issuing of bank circulation has the same effect, or nearly the same effect, as the issue of greenbacks. Why, sir, that is shown by our experience. The issue of the fifty-four millions under the bill of 1870, within the last four years, has prevented the appreciation of our notes any nearer to par in gold than they were the very day that law passed. For four years we have been prevented from marching toward specie payments by the gradual issue of the increased bank circulation authorized by the act of 1870. It only reached the fifty-four million maximum within the last few months; but the increase in bank circulation has prevented the otherwise gradual advance to specie payments which would have occurred but for this increase. Therefore, if we authorize any increase of bank circulation without any provision for retiring the greenbacks, diminishing the value of the whole, it ought to be accompanied by some counter-proposition.

The Secretary of the Treasury, perhaps I would not betray confidence in saying, wishes to retire an equal amount of greenbacks. As the bank-notes are issued, he wishes to have an equal amount of greenbacks retired. There is a good deal of force in the argument that this is a contraction of the currency; for whenever bank-notes are issued a certain amount of greenbacks must be maintained as a reserve, only 6 per cent., however. The average amount of greenbacks now maintained as a reserve is only between 6 and 9 per cent. The great body of the reserves of the country banks are now in deposit banks where they are loaned out. The amount of greenbacks actually maintained as a reserve on the circulation is only about 9 per cent., according to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, not 15. Although the amount of the reserve is nominally 15 per cent., yet three-fifths of that reserve may be loaned to other banks, and therefore it is not maintained in greenbacks. Hence, strictly speaking, the issue of $1,000,000 in bank-notes is equivalent to the issue of $900,000 of greenbacks. That is about the proportion of the diminution of value caused by these two different currencies. We thought, therefore, that as these new bank-notes issued, a certain proportion of the greenbacks should be retired to prevent the inevitable effect of the depreciation of our paper money. We sought by the operation of this section, while yielding an increase of the currency, while providing for local demands in local communities, providing for a general increase of the currency—because every bank that is organized will lead to an increase of the currency—yet we provide that this increase may not be so disastrous in its effects as if it was a pure inflation of paper money.

Now, as to whether 70 per cent. is the proper proportion, that is a question for the Senate; whether 50 or 70 or 90 per cent. is the proper ratio is a question of detail. The committee thought on the whole that 70 per cent. was about the average, because it would provide for a sure and certain increase of local circulation, and it would cause in a very easy way, after the bank circulation had gone out, a gradual reduction of the volume of the legal-tenders. It would have a double effect. As new banks are organized and the legal-tenders retired, the basis of redemption is improved and bettered, and the United States will only have the burden of the redemption of three hundred millions of notes when the time comes for the absolute resumption of specie payments.

My colleague calls my attention to a provision here as to the $300,000,000, this provision limiting the aggregate amount of United States notes outstanding to $300,000,000. That would be the effect any way, because the amount of bank-notes provided for by this bill is about $110,000,000; 70 per cent. of that would be $77,000,000, and the only possible reduction under the operations of this bill of the volume of greenbacks would be $77,000,000. True, that would not bring the maximum down from $382,000,000 further than to $305,000,000; but my colleague himself and other Senators a year ago insisted that the effect of the measure, especially the effect of free banking, would be to drive out of circulation the whole volume of greenbacks, so that we should have no greenbacks whatever, and the whole volume of circulation would be in bank-notes. Although it would be easy to answer this ad captandum argument by showing that under the operations of this bill it is not possible to reduce the greenbacks below $305,000,000, yet to avoid a sentiment that might be created against it, there is an express provision put in that under the operations of this section the amount of greenbacks shall not be reduced below $300,000,000. The authority to issue bank-notes is confined by a rule that will not allow more than $110,000,000 to be issued, and I would be perfectly willing to take free banking and run the risk if you reduced the volume of greenbacks to $300,000,000. The bill declares that every State and Territory may organize banks up to the standard now outstanding in the State of New York.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator be willing to state now what objection he would have to striking out the limitation of $300,000,000 and letting this retirement of greenbacks go on until they were at a par with coin?

Mr. SHERMAN. I may answer that at another time. I ask now for the reading of section 5 of the bill.

The Secretary read section 5, as follows:

SEC. 5. That each national banking association, now organized or hereafter to be organized, shall keep and maintain, as a part of its reserve required by law, one-fourth part of the coin received by it as interest on bonds of the United States deposited as security for circulating notes or Government deposits; and that hereafter only one-fourth of the reserve now prescribed by law for national banking associations shall consist of balances due to an association available for the redemption of its circulating notes from associations in cities of redemption, and upon which balances no interest shall be paid.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was not the design of the Committee on Finance to enter at large into any detailed modifications of the national banking act. There are a great many amendments proposed to the banking law that are pending before the committee, but we did not intend to report in connection with this bill any provisions of detail, but only those salient, strong points which affect the volume and value of the currency.

Now, it is manifest, and it has been manifest to all, that the reserve of the banks being now mainly deposited in the city of New York has been the fruitful cause of nearly all the panics and troubles that we have had upon us. The ordinary course of trade flows to New York. There is the mart to which the surplus produce of the country goes. The currency, therefore, is kept in large masses there, naturally, without any provision of law. But when you encourage all the national banks in the United States to put three-fifths of their entire reserve, both on their circulating notes and on their deposits, in the city of New York, you necessarily carry there from one hundred million to one hundred and forty million dollars. That lies in New York, where, by a vicious system that has sprung up of late years, the banks pay a rate of interest of 3 or 4 per cent. for it.

What is the effect of it? This money, instead of being loaned at home in the locality to the people who would use it for the development of the local industries, is sent to New York to receive this small rate of interest and to be used at very high rates of interest at a later period when money is wanted to move the crops. Money accumulates in New York at certain seasons of the year for speculative purposes; the banks paying interest on it are compelled to loan it, and they do loan it. They loan it to stock-operators; they loan it to aid wild schemes; and the banks do not often stop to realize how much they contribute by their small loans to the great speculations of the times. It is loaned out, and then the time comes when the drafts from the country banks come eastward calling for currency to flow westward to move the crops. That at once creates contraction, panic, fear, and trouble; and the New York banks cannot respond.

Why, sir, I was in the city of Cincinnati last September in the midst of the panic, and I saw men going around the city almost crazy with fright, bankers, wealthy men, because they said they had their money tied up in New York. They were required to keep it in New York; they were required by your banking law to keep it there; or at least it was their privilege to keep it there, and in the ordinary course of trade they kept it there. They could not get it; they were in fear every moment of being compelled to fail, although they were among the strongest institutions of the country. It was only four or five days until they made other arrangements at home, and the banks in Cincinnati went through the panic and only suspended three or four days because of the want of their money in the banks in New York. The banks in New York refused to pay them the very money deposited with them, except in certified checks which they could not use or sell. That was the effect; and the influence of that effect is still existing, creating distress and want of confidence. The provisions of this bill relieve the banks from that trouble. They are now required to keep all their deposits and all their reserve at home except one-fourth of the amount, which may be used by them in the ordinary course of their exchanges, and upon this they are forbidden to receive interest.

The only other provision of this section to which it is necessary for me to call the attention of the Senate is that it was deemed wise, and I believe was almost universally concurred in, not only by every member of the committee, but by everybody, that these banks which now receive from the Government of the United States from 5 to 6 per cent. interest in gold on the bonds held by them as a security for their circulating notes should be required gradually to accumulate gold. After considerable deliberation and hesitation as to the proportion of gold they should maintain in their vaults, it has been finally put at one-fourth, so that of the amount of gold received by the banks, if it should be about $30,000,000 annually, which is very nearly the amount, the banks will be compelled to accumulate in their vaults from six to seven million dollars annually as a part of their reserve. This has a double effect: first, by strengthening the banks, keeping gold in their possession, and next by unlocking and relieving just so much of the greenback circulation and allowing that to flow into the ordinary channels of trade and industry and commerce, the gold lying in the vaults instead of greenbacks. So in one sense it may operate to inflate the currency, but at the same time it operates to strengthen the banks.

Mr. President, these are all the provisions of this bill, except the sixth section, which I think I commented upon as much as I wish to. That sixth section was simply intended to guard against the possibility of an increase of our debt by the operation of this bill. As I have shown you, it could only occur in one way, not to be supposed—a condition of affairs when the Congress of the United States would refuse to provide the ordinary means for carrying on the operations of the Government.

Now, sir, let me tell Senators that this is not a struggle between factions or parties. There are no party divisions here; there are no sectional divisions. Although you may show petitions from the West in favor of inflation, yet you know very well, and every Senator here knows, that among the business men of the country, the men who are carrying on the great operations of the country, the feeling is almost universal in favor of some gradual and steady advance toward a specie standard. In the East the weight of this influence is prevailing. In the West probably the desire for inflation is prevailing. It is not a local question; it is not a sectional question; it is not a party question; it is a question that involves the faith and honor of our country. Nor is it a question between debtor and creditor. We have no right to add to the burden of the debtor. We have no right to confiscate the property of the creditor. We ought to hold the scales even and equal between them. We must pass measures to promote the public interests; we cannot pass laws to advance the interests of one at the sacrifice of the interests of the other. Now, sir, keeping in view always that we must provide a currency, a national currency, well distributed, suitable in amount, advancing in credit, gradually approaching to par in gold, it is also our sacred duty not to depreciate this currency; not to dishonor it; not to reduce its purchasable power While every measure toward inflation tends in one direction, every measure of contraction tends in the other. The Committee on Finance may not have been able to strike a satisfactory line between these two opposing ideas; but they have thought patiently, diligently, and surrendered in some cases their own individual opinions to strike that golden mean which would restore confidence to the business of the country, start again in motion the wheels of enterprise and commerce, start our manufactories, give confidence to our farmers, furnish them a market, start our blacksmiths and the mechanics all over the country, so that the busy hum of industry may revive again and fill our land with joy and gladness.

Mr. THURMAN, Mr. President, if there is any other Senator who desires to speak on this bill this afternoon, I will give way. I desire to offer a very few observations, but I am perfectly willing to defer them until to-morrow; if, however, there is nobody else who wishes to speak now, I will go on at once.

Mr. President, I have never in my congressional life risen to what is called a personal explanation; and I regret that the first observations I have to make this afternoon will be somewhat in the nature of such an explanation; but they have been forced upon me, not by what has been said elsewhere, not by what has been said in newspapers, although I have as much respect for the public journals as any man, but by what has been said in this Senate. The Senator from Michigan who now occupies the chair [Mr. FERRY] saw fit in a deliberately written speech to assail me because I did not speak on the currency question, as if it was not a merit not to speak upon it! At a time when speaking was consuming the time that ought to have been employed in legislation, and prolonging the distress of the country, and preventing business from resuming its usual channels, and when to delay legislation by speaking was almost a crime, a brother Senator saw fit to arraign me because I did not talk. But, sir, that is not the only singular part of this arraignment. The Senator was pleased further to intimate that my reticence had something peculiar about it, and to intimate that I was shirking an expression of my opinions; that I was avoiding committing myself to the expression of any opinion upon this great question. And the Senator was pleased to read from a newspaper to convey the idea that I was misrepresenting my constituents and that I was guilty of inconsistency, and then further to refer to certain measures in the Senate, upon which votes had been taken where my name did not appear, to convict me of what is familiarly called "dodging." Well, sir, let us see.

But, first, I have to say that before a Senator deliberately sits down in his closet to write charges against a fellow-Senator, he ought to be very well assured of the truth whereof he speaks. I saw the speech of the Senator from Michigan this afternoon, for the first time. I did not hear it; I never read it; I never saw it until this afternoon. This may account for the fact that I have not replied to it before. What is it the Senator said? After arraigning me for not speaking, he proceeded as follows:

Let me read a paragraph from a recent number of the Cincinnati Enquirer, wherein, in answer to the remark that it would "be glad to hear of Senator THURMAN redeeming the promise he made during our late canvass," it puts its grievance in these words:

"Last fall when the panic began Senator THURMAN justly characterized it in his speeches as the result of an effort on the part of the creditor East to force the debtor South and West into a violent resumption of specie payment, by which the debt of $100 would really cost the debtor $150. Senator THURMAN went further, and declared if God would give him strength to reach Washington his voice would be heard resisting this effort on the part of eastern capitalists, which, if successful, would end in wide-spread financial ruin. This contest has now been going on for over two months, and our distinguished friend has made no sign."

That is from the Cincinnati Enquirer, and the Senator from Michigan went on to say:

Verily, "made no sign," except to advocate recommittal of the subject without instructions to a committee already announced by resolution to be in favor of resumption.

Waiving comments upon the honorable Senator's vote not appearing in favor of the Cameron amendment to make the banking monopoly free to all; nor for like object and convertibility of Treasury notes into low-interest bonds under the Gordon amendment; nor in favor of reconsidering the vote that carried the Cooper instructions to the committee to report a bill providing for the convertibility of Treasury notes into gold coin or 5 per cent. bonds of the United States; neither in favor of the Merrimon amendment to increase the currency forty-six millions; searching in vain for his votes on these important questions, the honorable Senator's pent-up views and votes finally break out in a satirical descent upon a substitute "offered by the Senator from Michigan"—

because it proposes practical measures to "give stability and elasticity to the circulating medium."

I need read no more. Now, what is all this? First, an extract from the Cincinnati Enquirer is read which abounds in mistakes. In that extract it is said that—

Last fall when the panic began, Senator THURMAN justly characterized it in his speeches as the result of an effort on the part of the creditor East to force the debtor South and West into a violent resumption of specie payment.

Mr. President, I never uttered such an idea in the world. I never thought of such an idea as that the panic was the result of an attempt by the creditor East to force a resumption of specie payments. On the contrary, in every speech I made on this subject from the first one, in the town of Kenton, to the last one, and especially in the elaborate speech I delivered in Cincinnati, I said that the panic was the result of overtrading, excessive indebtedness, and of congressional legislation; that it was overtrading, running too much into debt, embarking in unremunerative enterprises, and notably, that it was the North Pacific Railroad enterprise, that had been stimulated by Congress, which brought about that panic. Never did I say that that panic was the result of an attempt to resume specie payments, for nobody could say that, or think it, who knew anything about the subject; but what I did say upon the subject of the resumption of specie payments is what I have ever said, what I said in this Senate when the bill of the Finance Committee was before us a year or two years ago; what I said again and again to the people of Ohio; and that was that in my judgment the time had not come to resume specie payments. And speaking of what was very often said last September, that owing to the shrinkage of values we had arrived at a period when we could resume specie payments, speaking of the assertion of certain newspapers in the East, that the shrinkage of values had reached nearly 25 per cent. and had removed the great obstacle to the resumption of specie payments, and that we could resume at once—speaking of that opinion, and believing that an attempt would be made to legislate according to that judgment, I did say then, what I say still, that I am opposed to legislation that shall coerce an immediate resumption of specie payments.

That is what I said. That was my position. Never did any man hear me utter one word in favor of inflation—not one word, sir. I have spoken against a contraction of the currency that would bring about too speedily a resumption of specie payments; but never have I spoken in favor of that inflation of the currency which I think I see full well means that there never shall be any resumption at all. That is the difference. It is one thing to contract the currency with a view to a resumption of specie payments; it is another thing neither to contract nor enlarge it, but let resumption come naturally and as soon as the business and production of the country will bring it about. But it is a very different thing indeed to inflate the currency with a view never in all time to redeem it at all. And that is precisely what this inflation means. It means demonetizing gold and silver in perpetuity, and substituting a currency of irredeemable paper, based wholly and entirely upon Government credit, and depending upon the opinion and the interests of members of Congress and their hopes of popularity whether the volume of it shall be large or whether it shall be small. That is what this inflation means. Sir, I have never said anything in favor of that. I am too old-fashioned a democrat for that; I have heard and preached too many hard-money lessons to advocate such a theory as that; and although there are many friends who differ with me in opinion and from whom it pains me to differ, I cannot give up the convictions of a life-time, whether they be popular or unpopular; whether they please or whether they displease.

But, sir, that is not all. The Senator from Michigan was pleased to refer to four amendments upon which my votes were not recorded—the Cameron amendment, the Gordon amendment, the Cooper instruction, and the Merrimon amendment. Now, sir, I have to say that before a Senator sits down deliberately to write a charge against a brother Senator of dodging votes, or to intimate such a thing as that, he might at least have the justice, if not the decency, to inquire why that Senator was absent. Those votes were all taken in two days, the 19th and the 20th of February, and at the very time they were taken, and before that time and for days after that time, I was stretched on a bed of painful sickness, unable for the most part to sit up, much less to come to the Senate. And yet a Senator, without inquiry, without asking me when I afterward came into the Senate how it was that I did not vote on these measures, can sit down deliberately and pen an accusation, and spread it all over the country, to the effect that I have dodged votes!

But, sir, with what propriety was such a charge made when I had said to the Senate, and the Senator knew it, for he quotes it here, that I would vote against every one of those instructions and amendments no matter what might be their intrinsic merits, because I was in favor of sending the subject back to the Committee on Finance to mature a bill that would meet the approval of their judgment, because the open Senate was no place to mature such a bill. Every one knew that had I been here I would have voted against each one of those propositions, for I had so declared, and had acted upon that declaration in voting against other propositions that were made by other Senators.

But, Mr. President, enough of this. The reason of the Senator from Michigan for these accusations is that I spoke in derision, as he thought, of a proposition of his in which he asked the Senate by way of instruction to the committee to do thus and so, and among other things to give stability and elasticity to the circulating medium by a moderate increase of it. I did speak of that, and I did not suppose I spoke offensively. I did say then, and I repeat now, that I did not know what that meant; that it seemed to me to mean stable and not stable, fixed and not fixed. But the Senator from Michigan thinks that a just commentator would have found out that it meant this: "that it meant stable in value and elastic in volume." Well, so help me Heaven, if I am not as much at a loss now as I was before. "Stable in value and elastic in volume!" That is, the purchasing power of a greenback dollar shall be the same whether the volume of greenbacks is five hundred or a thousand million dollars. That would be elastic enough which could expand to a thousand millions, but where would be its stability in value? Now, after the explanation, I confess myself just as much at a loss as before.

Mr. President, before I proceed further, let me say something more about the panic. The panic was not created by the currency, unless there was a redundant currency that stimulated overtrading and also stimulated the embarking in enterprises that would not pay. If the currency was redundant and had the usual effect of redundancy, namely, to stimulate overtrading and to cause men to embark in enterprises that could not be remunerative, then it had something to do with the panic. Otherwise it had not. It is clearly impossible that a currency too limited, and whose volume had been the same for a considerable period, could produce a panic. That is, the mere want of a sufficient amount could not have that effect. Such a deficiency might have a depressing effect upon business, but it would not produce a panic.

But, Mr. President, there is a very great mistake in supposing that the currency of the country is one of the chief reasons or causes of a panic. The reason of this error is that those who think so have not taken into account the great, I might say the radical, change in English and American banking that has taken place within the last forty years. Forty years ago the chief source of profit of a bank was its circulating notes. That is so no longer anywhere in Great Britain or in the United States. The chief source of profit of a bank is now its deposits, and not its circulating medium; and the amount of the deposits held by banks and bankers in the United States is perhaps fourfold the whole amount of the circulating medium in the United States, taking all the banks together—national banks, savings-banks, private banks—in short, all institutions and men who receive money on deposit. It perhaps is not too much to say that the deposits exceed by fourfold the amount of the paper circulation of the country; and this peculiarity is a thing that has grown up within forty years. It commenced in Great Britain. Take the Bank of Dundee, now the Royal Bank of Scotland, as an illustration. It did business from 1763 until 1792 without receiving deposits. Its whole profit was on its circulation and what little dealing it did in exchange. In 1794 its deposits were only £48,809; in 1864 they were £684,898; and I have no doubt that at this time they are far in excess of that amount.

But how is it with the banks of England? I will take, for illustration, the Bank of England and the London joint-stock banks. The deposits of the Bank of England and of the London joint-stock banks amount to £120,000,000, or $600,000,000, while the circulation, being confined to the Bank of England alone, is only £33,288,640, and of those £33,288,640 in circulation, £18,288,640 are based upon an equal amount of bullion in the vaults of the bank. So that the deposits in London are four and one-half times the amount of the circulation.

Well, sir, go to Switzerland. The notes issued by all their banks amount to £761,000, while their deposits are £4,709,000. So the deposits are six times as much as the circulation in the Swiss Republic.

How is it with our own national banks—and now I am not taking the deposits of any other than national banks; no savings-banks, no State banks, no joint-stock banks, no private banks, but simply the deposits of our own national banks—and what proportion do they bear to the circulation of those banks? The deposits of our national banks are $638,613,000; while their circulation outstanding is only $339,000,000. So that their indebtedness to depositors is nearly twice as great as the amount of their circulation; and when we add what they owe to others than depositors and holders of their notes, we find that their circulating notes do not constitute one-third of their indebtedness.

Does not everybody see, then, that panics are not produced, as they formerly were, by a fear that a bank will not redeem its notes? Did anybody last September make a run on a national bank because he was fearful that the bank would not redeem its notes? No, sir. On the con rary, it has often been said, and I think my friend from Indiana has said it here, that our currency was so good that it helped to produce the panic, because people hoarded it. That is what was said, and that is what was true to some extent. The people did hoard it. Instead of running to a national bank with its notes and demanding redemption, the people went to it and drew the notes out and put them in their own pockets, rather than leave them on deposit in the bank. They were fearful they would not get the notes of that very same institution, and therefore, instead of leaving them on deposit, they went and took them out, and put them in their own pockets. This was so for several weeks, and proved that the fear was not that the notes would not be redeemed, but that the depositors would not be paid.

This, then, was no panic created by a distrust in the currency of the country. It was a panic produced by the belief that certain institutions were unable to pay their debts. That is the truth of it. It was because the people knew that certain institutions were embarked in hazardous enterprises, and were most probably insolvent, if not bankrupt. It was the fear that these men would never pay in anything at all that produced a run upon them, and that distrust becoming general brought about the panic of September last, and caused a run on nearly all the moneyed institutions of the country, the solvent as well as the insolvent.

Now, Mr. President, in view of these facts, I never could have been guilty of the absurdity of saying that at a time when there was no effort being made to resume specie payments; in a vacation of Congress when no legislation could take place, I never could have been guilty of the absurdity of saying that the panic was the result of any such attempt. Nor could I do it in the light of legislation; for what single act of legislation, I crave to know, has taken place since I have held a seat on this floor that looks toward a resumption of specie payments? If there is any, I have failed to see it. You have increased the irredeemable paper currency of this country $54,000,000 since I have sat here; but certainly no one will claim that that was a measure which looked toward a resumption of specie payments. Its tendency was exactly the opposite; and now, at this day, instead of taking any step that looks even ultimately toward the resumption of specie payments, we are asked to embark on an unknown and illimitable sea of irredeemable paper money now and forever.

Mr. President, it has been said that we who do not wish to embark on this voyage of inflation, and who come from the West, are not representing our constituents. Well, sir, I must say that if my colleague and I are misrepresenting the people of Ohio, it is very strange that neither he nor I have ever received a single petition to be presented to Congress asking for an increase of the currency. There is a great State. I do not stand here to boast of her; but I do say that she has a people as intelligent as any that I ever expect to represent or mingle with, and who understand their interests perfectly; and now I say to the Senate that I have not received one single petition from anybody in the State of Ohio asking Congress to increase the volume of currency; and if my colleague has, I would thank him to state it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not recall a case where I have received any such request from a constituent; but I have seen in the newspapers that they are divided somewhat, like other people.

Mr. THURMAN. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. SHERMAN. There have been no petitions except from cities where they are divided about paper money.

Mr. THURMAN. If there is this overwhelming public opinion, I should like to know why we have had no evidence of it. Nay, more, sir, I have received one expression of opinion from a highly respectable body of men, the Board of Trade of the city of Cincinnati, adverse to inflation, and I have heard that the boards of trade of some of the other cities of Ohio have passed similar resolutions; but how that is I do not know. But here stands the fact that not one single petition has been presented or sent to us from the State of Ohio asking for inflation.

Nay, sir, that is not all. The Legislature of Ohio is in session, and has been for months. Their constituents are all around them; they doubtless know what is the popular sentiment there, and know it better than I, for they are at home among the people. They know very well that I hold it to be my duty to obey the will of my constituents, where I can do so consistently with the Constitution of my country. They know that I not only consider it my duty to forego my own individual opinion in deference to theirs, but I do it cheerfully and without complaint. And yet, sir, no instructions have come from that body to the Senators on this floor, or any expression of opinion in favor of an inflation of the currency. It is very strange, if there is a great popular demand there that we should do this thing, that there has been no manifestation of it.

But that is not all. I say here in this Senate that in the multitude of letters which I have received from the State of Ohio since the beginning of this session there are but two in which the opinion is expressed that inflation is proper.

Mr. President, I believe that the people of Ohio want this question decided according to its merits; they want it decided intelligently and wisely; and they will vindicate their representatives in doing what is intelligent and wise.

Mr. President, there was an expression of public opinion to which I may very properly allude. On the 6th of August last there assembled in the capital of the State of Ohio one of the largest political conventions that ever was held in that State. I believe there was not a single county in the State that was not fully represented. It was a convention containing as large a proportion of the able men of the State as any body, official or unofficial, legislative or popular, ever contained. Among the resolutions passed by that convention with entire unanimity was this. Speaking of the democratic party, it says:

> It recognizes the evils of an irredeemable currency, but insists that in the return to specie payments care should be taken not to seriously disturb the business of the country or unjustly injure the debtor class.

That was the platform of the democratic party of Ohio last fall, and on that platform it went to battle, and with that platform victory perched upon its standard. I stood on that platform then. I drew those words with my own right hand. I stood by them then, and I stand by them now; and I believe that the people of my State also stand by them.

Now, Mr. President, it is impossible for any man not to see how much of the debate on this subject is mere skirmishing. Does not every Senator know that there is a class of political economists, if they can be called political economists, in this country who insist that the precious metals shall be demonetized, and that the only currency we shall have in this country shall be a paper currency founded upon Government credit? Does not everybody know that? Well, sir, what shall be that paper currency? There they differ. Some say it shall be a national-bank currency. Others say that national-bank notes should be retired, and there should be nothing but a greenback currency. But, then, as to the volume of the currency. Here is a large number of men I know in favor of the theory that you shall increase this volume of currency to $1,200,000,000 or $1,500,000,000, or even $2,000,000,000, and by making it convertible into a bond bearing a low rate of interest, say 2½ or 3 per cent., shall bring down the rate of interest all over the country to that rate. They believe in that theory. They think it sound. They firmly believe that you can by the machinery of a convertible bond at a low rate of interest, and an unlimited amount of paper money, give everybody in the country as much money as he wants at 2 or 2½ per cent. interest. That is what they mean by making money cheap.

Now, Mr. President, are we prepared to do that? Are we prepared to declare that under a government which our fathers meant, if they meant anything, should be a hard-money government, but which has drifted a long way from their intention—do we now, against all the lights of experience the world over, mean to banish gold and silver from circulation in the country for all time to come, and do the business of the country upon nothing but irredeemable paper, depending for its volume upon the will and caprice of the moment, or upon the views of members of Congress seeking re-election or aspiring to higher place? I think not. I do not think that all the lessons of experience have gone for nothing. I do not think that all the teachings of political economy are waste paper. I do not believe that we are yet ready for this entire revolution upon so great a subject. And yet I do say that every step that we propose in the way of inflation is a step toward that end, and the question will sooner or later have to be met. Are we to do the business of this country for all time upon a wholly irredeemable paper currency, or are we to have the standard that exists elsewhere throughout the civilized world? For it is of no use to say "We only propose to increase the currency forty, or fifty, or sixty, or one hundred million dollars now." Sir, you did that three years ago. You authorized its increase fifty-four millions then; and if you increase it one hundred millions now, three years hence there will be another demand for a further increase. The very same arguments will be used; the very same pressure will be brought to bear. Whenever there is overtrading, whenever people become deeply indebted, or whenever people have schemes of speculation which can only be secured by an inflation of the currency that shall turn men mad in the whirl of speculation or in the desire of amassing fortunes; whenever such a state of things comes about, the same agencies will be at work, the same efforts will be made that are being made now, and that are pushing us forward to what I see is likely to be the result—an inflation of the currency that will only aggravate the evils under which we at present labor. At least this is my opinion.

I repeat, that while I am opposed to any harsh measure to resume specie payments, while I am opposed to the contraction of the currency, while I am most anxious that we shall proceed so cautiously that we shall do as little injury as possible to the business interests of the country, and especially to the interests of the debtor class of the country, and not make them pay more than they contracted to pay—while I am anxious for that, I am unwilling to embark this country in overtrading and speculation, which have already brought such difficulties upon us and increased the indebtedness of the country so far as that no man can foretell what will be the end.

But, Mr. President, there is another thing that ought to be observed upon. Your inflation of the currency is not simply meant to enable individuals to increase their indebtedness, to enable railroad companies and the like to get themselves out of difficulties that they have improvidently got into; but at the bottom of it lies another thing that the people of the country ought to understand. It is that you shall so inflate the currency and create such a furor of speculation and business extravagance that Congress will be ready to embark in any and all measures of internal improvement that may be suggested by artful or interested men, until the debt of this nation, instead of being what it now is, shall be perhaps two or three fold that amount. All that lies also at the bottom of this business. This is but a stepping-stone. This proposition for a moderate inflation is but the first step toward that abyss to which we are tending; at least such is my opinion. And therefore, Mr. President, although many, very many, of my friends for whose views I am accustomed to entertain the most sincere respect differ with me widely on this subject, I am compelled to go by the lights of my own judgment and to oppose inflation.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Mr. President, if I have succeeded in drawing the fire of the honorable Senator from Ohio by a personal allusion and have thus wrested his expression of views upon the question of finance which has occupied months of debate without a word from him upon its merits, I have done more than he has voluntarily tendered, and I am honored by the achievement, the State of Ohio will be gratified, and the country will be grateful for the disclosure.

I think the record will show that I have not been accustomed to initiate personal reference on this floor; nor should I have trenched upon any possible impropriety, if it may be considered such, upon the occasion to which the honorable Senator has alluded, had he not invited it by a personal and satirical reference to myself, and this, too, not incidentally, but deliberately, and coupled with the only expression the honorable Senator had vouchsafed on this great subject of finance until to-day. The Senator needs no reminder of mine to commend the fact to his attention that he came into the Senate to utter his first words of financial instruction by a querulous descant upon the amendment I had the honor to offer. I know no parliamentary usage, no courtesy of the Senate, no rule whatever in this body which deprives any Senator holding his place on this floor of the privilege and right to offer any amendment to any pending proposition before the Senate. In the exercise of my right, I proposed at an early day of this session what I believed to be a measure that would secure to the country substantial relief. The Senator, however—for he has not combated the fact I stated—failing to speak or vote until he directed remarks, and the only remarks he had made to the amendment I offered, in a tone of derision, it became my duty in self-respect and in deference to the merits of the amendment to defend my proposition. The honorable Senator complains that while he lay sick in his bed I deliberately considered and prepared my allusion to him. He does not forget that he was the initiator of personal reference, and, I may add, with months of silence for preparation. I have this, however, to say in passing, that had I been apprised of what the Senator has now for the first time disclosed, that he was lying on a bed of sickness, the great respect I have for that Senator, and the regret I should have entertained for his illness, and the sympathy that I must have experienced for his condition would have prevented me from making any personal allusion, whatever the provocation. But as I had seen the Senator upon the floor, passing in and out of the Chamber, and, as the records will show, participating in proceedings and debate upon other propositions prior to that time, and when all here know and the country knows that his versatility quickens his indulgence to speak upon all questions before the country, and has never failed to make himself heard upon most questions before the Senate; knowing all this, and finding that he spoke only upon my amendment and simply to ridicule it, as I said, it became my duty to speak and arraign the honorable Senator, as he calls it.

Now, what did I say? First, I quoted the honorable Senator's words; and let me quote them again in the same temper in which I uttered them before, and it may cool the fervor of my friend. I have no personal ill-will to the honorable Senator; for, aside from his extreme partisanship, I hold him in as high esteem as any Senator on this floor. I will quote again his words, which I made a part of my remarks, and I am thankful to know that by no inadvertence was I led into error of statement, for the Senator has not said that I misstated, but that he really did not vote nor did he speak except at the time to which his attention was called. The honorable Senator said at the time he spoke:

> Mr. President, I have not said a word on this great subject, and if the Senate is not impatient to adjourn at this hour I should like to occupy about fifteen minutes.

Further he said:

> I take my full share of the responsibility for talking on other matters. On this, fortunately for me, I have perfectly clean skirts.

These his own words which I have quoted prove what I stated, that he had said nothing on the financial subject.

Now I call attention to his language in reference to my amendment. The honorable Senator, alluding to that amendment, with other derisive words, said:

> If it was made out of India rubber it would not be stable. It is to be stable, that is, to be fixed; and it is to be elastic, that is, it is not to be fixed.

I could do no less than reply to the honorable Senator that if it escaped his attention and knowledge it might not that of others that a currency could be stable in value and elastic in volume. I am obliged to the chairman of the Committee on Finance that he has reported from the majority of that committee—not with my entire approval, but as the representative of the major voice of that committee—a measure which is the one now pending, and upon which the honorable Senator from Ohio, his colleague, has spoken, by which the currency of the country may not only be made stable, but may be elastic—both stable in value and elastic in volume. It attempts by conversion to appreciate the currency and thus fix the stability of its value, and by free banking enlarge its volume, thus giving elasticity to that currency. I sought in a different way the same object. I sought by making the whole currency lawful money to give stable value to that currency, and I sought by free banking to give elasticity to its volume, thus meeting the terms of my amendment.

I saw fit then to say:

> The honorable Senator, it seems, could not forego derision lest some one might readily comprehend that a currency could be stable in value and elastic in volume. Nor did it occur to me, when I drew up the text of my amendment, but was discovered when the Senator spoke, that I had presumed somewhat upon the fairness of commentators.

Neither that language, nor any language I used, was indecent, as the Senator has characterized it. My reference to the Senator was entirely within the bounds of decency, notwithstanding the Senator implies it was not. I did not use the word "indecent," or anything like it; and I put my language with the Senator's, and leave it to the Senate and the public to judge of the question of decency or courtesy.

When the Senator stepped out of his way to make reference to the amendment I offered, with the criticism he employed, and had not himself suggested anything upon the subject, I thought I was traveling within the political domain of the Senator in referring to his own party press and a leading journal in his own State, who, perceiving that the Senator during three months of the discussion of this subject had failed to utter his voice, when he had so frequently and ably spoken upon other questions, had commented upon his silence.

This was the offense, if such it could be; and I repeat what I then quoted for his benefit again:

> Let me read a paragraph from a recent number of the Cincinnati Enquirer, wherein in answer to the remark that it would "be glad to hear of Senator THURMAN redeeming the promise he made during our late canvass," it puts its grievance in these words:
> "Last fall when the panic began, Senator THURMAN justly characterized it in his speeches as the result of an effort on the part of the creditor East to force the debtor South and West into a violent resumption of specie payment, by which the debt of $100 would really cost the debtor $150. Senator THURMAN went further, and declared if God would give him strength to reach Washington his voice would be heard resisting this effort on the part of eastern capitalists, which, if successful, would end in wide-spread financial ruin. This contest has now been going on for over two months, and our distinguished friend has made no sign."

I did not then attempt nor am I now disposed to settle the consistency of the Senator with campaign assurances. I leave that with his own party press. I merely cited the comment of that paper, and left the Senator, as I leave him now, to reconcile his actions now and his expressions during the late campaign; nothing more, nothing less. If I have offended, the journalist has offended the Senator; and if I have done injury or injustice through the editor's comments, I beg the Senator's pardon. If I have not committed wrong, I leave it, as I said, for the Senator himself to adjust with the people before whom he so eloquently spoke, and to whom he gave assurances at the hustings.

Mr. President, I said that I was thankful that I had drawn out an expression of the Senator on the pending question; and yet I am at a loss to know even now where he stands. The Senator is always able enough, he is always fruitful enough; and yet to-day, and until to-day, no proposition has he offered, and no plan, while early in the session I presented a plan of my own. So that upon the score of origin and suggestion I put the Senator from Michigan with the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. President, was I then far out of the way when I said, on that unfortunate occasion to which exception is taken, that "the Senator has voted nothing, and proposes to do nothing," when he had said, "I shall therefore vote to refer back the whole subject, whenever I can get the opportunity to do it, to that committee, and without any instructions whatever?"

Why, sir, the Committee on Finance itself could not agree to come to the Senate for instructions, and when the instructions were being voted on and about to be concluded, the Senator was not even then, after unbroken silence, prepared to interpose by any act or utterance of views, but simply ready to recommit to the committee without any instructions whatever. Therefore I had the right to say, as it was the fact, that he had not spoken nor acted, nor did he propose to speak or act upon the merits of the question, but solely to remand the bill back to the committee whence it came, with not even an intimation from the enlightened judgment of the Senator from Ohio. It was hardly fair to his colleague to roll the responsibility of framing and presenting to the Senate a proposition to meet a grave subject of national welfare, upon which he could not in advance venture some light for the benefit of the chairman of the Committee on Finance.

Now, Mr. President, in what sense have I offended? I spoke in terms at least as moderate as the Senator, in language as courteous as my friend, and, had I known he had been ill, tempered with sympathy as broad and deep as he possibly commands; and yet I am arraigned because I replied to his imputation. Why, sir, I should be unfaithful to myself, and false to the constituency I represent, did I not upon such an implication reply to it here.

I have but to say in closing that, intrusted by the State I in part represent with her honor and her rights, as long as I hold my place upon this floor I shall endeavor to maintain that honor and those rights as an American Senator.

Holding, as I do, all Senators here in more or less esteem as my acquaintance with them ripens, and none higher than I do the Senator from Ohio, for his ability and experience challenge my respect, and in the amenities of association not to be outdone among peers, I tell the Senator that so long as I hold place here I shall be true to my trust, and whenever he or any other Senator has a thrust to give he must remember that there shall be thrusts to take.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, it is only necessary to turn back to the few remarks that I submitted, and which appear to have moved so deeply the Senator from Michigan, to see that there was not one word personal in them. They could not have been more impersonal if I had been speaking of a sentence found in a newspaper; and his name was simply mentioned because it was necessary in order to designate what I was speaking about. The whole thing is in a few words. I came into the Senate late in the evening, having been performing what the Senate has imposed on me this whole session almost, a very onerous amount of committee duty; and I made a few remarks upon the subject which was then before the Senate, in the course of which I said that in my judgment the whole matter should be referred back to the committee without instructions. In the first place, I rather took the committee to task for not reporting something definite, because the committee was instituted for that purpose, and instead of waiting for others to propose measures it was the duty of the committee, a committee whose personnel is nearly the same that it has been for many years, and whose familiarity with this subject is supposed to be, and doubtless is, much greater than mine or that of the generality of Senators—it was their duty to propose some definite measure; and therefore the first thing that I said was rather, but in perfect good temper, to take that committee to task for bringing in a mere "tub to the whale," throwing out a mere vague resolution for the discussion of the Senate instead of bringing in something definite upon which we could act. Then, after alluding to the resolution of the committee, I turned to the substitute of the Senator from Michigan and said:

Then we had a substitute for this resolution offered by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] who asks us to strike out all after the word "resolved," and instruct the committee as follows:

"That the Committee on Finance is directed to report to the Senate at as early a day as practicable such measures as will restore commercial confidence."

Upon which I observed:

What does that mean, I should like to know? What "commercial confidence" is shaken that requires legislation to restore it? I should like to have some explanation of that; I have heard none yet.

Certainly there was nothing disrespectful to anybody in that comment.

Then what next?

Then quoting from his substitute:

"And give stability and elasticity to the circulating medium."

And then I went on to say:

That is a little funny.

And then the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] said "India rubber." It was he that brought in that term.

Mr. THURMAN. No; if it was made out of India rubber it would not be stable. It is to be stable, that is, to be fixed; and it is to be elastic, that is, it is not to be fixed. [Laughter.] That is that thing. Then as to the modus of making it stable and elastic, that is, fixed and not fixed; that is, "through a moderate increase of the currency." I have heard nothing like that since General Jackson's famous letter about "a judicious tariff."

There was not one word of personality. As I said before, if the proposition had appeared in a newspaper and I had been commenting on it, I could not have been more impersonal than I was. But, sir, enough of that. Now one word more upon what has just been said by the Senator, that I have proposed nothing. Why, here is my friend from Indiana who sits before me, [Mr. MORTON], and who has spoken I think about one dozen times, more or less, on this finance question since the 1st of December last; and if he has proposed anything, I have never heard it. He has opposed theories, and he has advanced theories of his own, or rather one theory of his own which finds all the blessings Heaven can visit on this earth, or at least on this country, in a shower of greenbacks or national-bank notes, and a pretty large shower, too; not a summer shower, but a good, hard, soaking fall rain. I have heard no definite proposition from him. Then there is the Senator from Michigan. What is his definite proposition? When he calls upon me to produce my plan, why does he not produce his own?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Does the Senator want a reply?

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to know, if the Senator has produced a plan, what it is.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I am in favor of voting the greenbacks up to four hundred millions, and I am in favor of free banking. Now I ask the Senator whether he is in favor of the bill reported by his colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, which includes the increase of the greenback currency to three hundred and eighty-two millions and free banking? I ask what the Senator's views are on that.

Mr. THURMAN. Now we are talking about plans, and the Senator refers me to the plan of the committee, and yet he does not say whether he will vote for that plan or not. I can tell him at once that although I have not had full time to study that, it having been reported but yesterday, my present impression is that I shall vote against that bill. It is very similar, in many respects, to the bill against which I voted about two years ago, and my impression is that I shall vote against it now. That is my present impression.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I can say to the Senator as frankly that I shall vote to make the volume of greenbacks four hundred millions, and I shall vote for free banking.

Mr. THURMAN. Then the Senator is not for this bill?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I am for those features of this bill.

Mr. THURMAN. The main feature of this bill is to stop short of four hundred millions of greenbacks; and instead of being free banking, it is an increase of banking capital of $110,000,000. That is all it is in the way of increase. Where is your free banking then, pray? Is there any free banking in Rhode Island under this bill, in any one of the New England States; any free banking in New York; any free banking in Ohio?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. Well, precious little, for we have got pretty nearly our share.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I will reply to the Senator. I labored under the difficulty, as I happened to be occupying the place you hold, sir, at the time the chairman of the Committee on Finance was explaining the bill, that I was precluded from the opportunity of stating that in the whole of the bill I could not agree. I will state now to the honorable Senator that I am in favor, as I said before, of making the greenbacks $400,000,000; and I am in favor of free banking. The majority of the committee have reported free banking to stand on the basis now held by the State of New York. I am for free banking, and as free as the Senator can make it, covering the whole boundaries of the United States.

Mr. THURMAN. And without restriction! That is, you do not restrain it to $110,000,000, but free banking just as much as anybody pleases! What does that mean? That means, if people could be seduced into it, an extension of the banking capital of this country perhaps $1,000,000,000. It is only limited by the amount of Government bonds. If you can get Government bonds enough and people can derive profit enough in free banking such as the Senator from Michigan contemplates, the only limit is the amount of Government bonds that can be procured and put up as security for the currency issued. What does that mean?

In the first place, it means, as I said before, an indefinite extension of irredeemable paper currency, and nobody will pretend that under such a system as that there would be any redemption in gold or silver.

But that is not all that it means. It means a perpetuation for all time to come of the national indebtedness, for if there is to be a perpetuation of the national-bank system, that means the national debt in perpetuity. If one is to be in perpetuity the other is to be in perpetuity, because the national-bank system is founded wholly and entirely upon the existence of a national debt. Pay off the debt and you take away the foundation of the national-bank system. You may provide then for other securities, but it will not be the present national-bank system any more. Therefore, the idea of perpetuating this national-bank system, or making it a system for all time to come, means that the national debt of this country shall endure as long as the country itself, and with the endurance of this national debt there will endure the heavy taxation, and especially the high protective tariff, under which the people of this country suffer. That is what it means. It means that the people of Ohio shall pay to the Senator from Michigan's constituents two or three dollars a thousand more for lumber than we should pay if we could get it free from Canada. That is what it means. It means that we shall pay high taxes upon almost everything we wear and every pound of iron or steel that we use in order to pay the interest upon an ever-enduring national debt. It means death to free trade, or anything like it. That is what the perpetuation of the national debt means. If the Senator, therefore, is in favor of extending forever the system of national banks, he is in favor of extending forever the national debt, and the onerous taxes and duties under which this people groan.

But, sir, the Finance Committee were not quite prepared for that, and therefore their free banking amounts simply to an addition of $110,000,000. But in respect to their free banking the Senator says it provides elasticity. I should like to know where the elasticity in it is. It provides that greenbacks may be funded in 5 per cent. bonds; but it does not provide, on the other hand, the feature of elasticity of the convertible bond, the bond that a man has a right to go to the Secretary of the Treasury with and demand greenbacks for. There is nothing of that in the bill. If the Secretary of the Treasury see fit to buy bonds with greenbacks, he may do it; but you put him under no obligation whatever to give greenbacks for bonds, and therefore there is no elasticity in it; and if the bill pass, the volume of the currency in the country, when every dollar shall have been issued under the bill that can be issued under it, will be fixed, and fixed by just as iron and arbitrary a rule as it is fixed to-day. There is no elasticity in it. This governor that is to run the currency machine with the unfailing certainty of the governor of a steam-engine, the convertible and reconvertible bond, convertible into greenbacks to-day and back into a bond to-morrow—this new Proteus that is to relieve the subject of finance of all difficulties whatsoever, is not found in this bill at all. It does not show its face in this bill at all. So that my friend from Michigan has not got in this child of the Finance Committee that currency which is to be stable and also to be elastic.

But, Mr. President, I am speaking longer upon this bill than I had any intention of doing. My present impressions are adverse to this bill, but I grant that in many respects it is a much better bill in my judgment than the bill which was presented two years ago, and it is infinitely better than unlimited inflation. There is one thing about it that I ought to have said when I was up before. I meant to call attention to the second section of the bill. The second section provides—the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to pay on demand, at the office of the Treasurer of the United States, and at the office of the assistant treasurer in the city of New York, to any holder of United States notes to the amount of $1,000, or any multiple thereof, in exchange for such notes, an equal amount of the gold coin of the United States; or, in lieu of coin, he may, at his option, issue in exchange for said notes an equal amount of coupon or registered bonds of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe, and of denominations of fifty dollars, or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin of the present standard value, at the pleasure of the United States, after ten years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest, payable quarterly in such coin, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum.

The idea of the committee, if I understand it, is that if that become a law its effect will be to bring greenbacks up to par in gold, and they reason in this way: that 5 per cent. bonds are now at par in gold, and that if you make a greenback a good purchasing medium for a 5 per cent. bond, you bring that greenback immediately up to the standard of the thing that is purchased. It does, however, seem to me that it is worthy of consideration whether you do not bring the thing to be purchased down toward the present standard of the greenback; that is, say a 5 per cent. bond can now be purchased with gold at par. Now, if you say to-day that that 5 per cent. bond may be purchased to-morrow with currency that is now 10 per cent. or 12 per cent. below par, the question is whether you do not lower the value of the bond instead of increasing the value of the currency.

I know the answer to this is that the value of the 5 per cent. bond is fixed abroad. But I am not quite sure that it is so fixed abroad; that there is such a demand for the bonds abroad that we can safely say that redeeming greenbacks in 5 per cents would bring them up to the par of gold. But yet it may be. I have no doubt of this fact, that it would enhance the value of greenbacks and that the premium on gold, as it is called, would be much less. But suppose it had the effect of bringing greenbacks to par on the 1st of January, 1876; that would be complete resumption of specie payments then, because if greenbacks shall then be equal to par in gold, if they shall be equal dollar for dollar with gold, then as every national bank is bound to redeem either in gold or in greenbacks, every such bank on the 1st day of January, 1876, will in effect be bound to redeem its notes in gold. In other words, this bill, if it will have the effect of appreciating greenbacks to gold, is a bill requiring complete resumption of specie payments in less than two years from this date. That strikes me as being too harsh.

I may be wrong about this, but I do not see the answer. The national banks may now redeem in greenbacks. That is no hardship on them now. But if you make the greenback equal to gold on the 1st day of January, 1876, then the whole nineteen hundred and seventy-six national banks now in existence, and those that may be created under this bill, every one of them, will be bound on that day and thenceforth to redeem their currency in a medium equal to gold in value—in gold, or in greenbacks equal to gold. It does seem to me, therefore, unless I greatly misapprehend it, that this bill of the committee is a bill to force a complete resumption of specie payments in twenty-one months from this date. Until that objection is removed I cannot vote for the bill; for I think that is too severe and too stringent. To say nothing of its probable effect upon the banks, I fear that it would add too heavy a load to the burdens of debtors.

Mr. President, I am no very great friend of this national banking system. I have not a plan of my own to substitute for it; for I do not assume to be as wise as the Senator from Michigan. At all events, the question will come up further along, when the charters of these banks expire; for nobody thinks now, I am sure, of adding to the troubles of the country by repealing the national-bank charters at once; and it will probably be time enough eight years hence, when these charters begin to expire, for us to determine whether a better system than the national-bank system can be devised or not. I can say in the words of the old adage, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." But, if this system is to exist, if the country shall determine that this shall be the permanent system by which paper money is to be supplied to the country, then I say too that it ought to be free; that is, I say too that it ought not to be a monopoly in the hands of a particular section of the country, nor ought it to be a monopoly in the hands of particular individuals. When I say "free," I do not say that there should be no limit at all; for, as I said before, I would require some limit upon it that shall prevent it from bankrupting and ruining the country, and becoming merely an instrument for the circulation of a wholly irredeemable currency. But I believe that whenever these banks shall be compelled to resume specie payments, whenever they shall pay their notes in specie, then there will be but little excess of their currency. But I am not in favor of saying that they shall be compelled to resume specie payments on the 1st day of January, 1876.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, as the Senator from Ohio referred to me in his remarks, I may be excused for saying a word. The position of the Senator has been looked forward to with some interest, not only here, but I know in his own State and elsewhere. I have listened to his remarks with attention, and I regret that I am unable now to understand what his position is except in two or three particulars. The substance of his remarks, I think, is that he is opposed now to any legislation that looks toward the resumption of specie payments. I think that much is clear. He also talked about inflation, but most of his remarks were directed to "unlimited inflation;" he used that term, I believe, or "extravagant inflation," inflation that throws away the idea of ever returning to specie payments. But I did not understand whether the Senator meant to say that any increase of the currency would be an inflation, to which he was opposed. He left his position upon that subject indefinite, and he left his position upon the question as to whether he was opposed to any extension of the privileges of national banks indefinite also. Now, there are several propositions on this subject which have been discussed here and which will arise upon this bill undoubtedly One is free banking—to take the restriction off the volume of notional-bank currency entirely; another is the proposition of the Finance Committee, to allow it to be increased in all the States to the ratio of New York, which would give about $110,000,000 more; and then there is the proposition of my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] that it may be allowed to be increased $46,000,000, with a view of equalizing the national-bank circulation among all the States. Now, does the Senator from Ohio intend us to understand that he is opposed to any extension at this time of national banking privileges to the States that need them? Does he mean to be so understood? His position is left indefinite on that subject. He said it would be time enough some eight years hence, when these charters began to expire, to determine what we will do in regard to making banking free; that if the country then determined that the system should be continued we could then make it free, or at least so extend it as to give its benefits equally to all, although it might not be entirely free. Does the Senator mean us to understand that he wants the national banking system to remain as it is, at its present limit, and to remain a monopoly for eight years to come?

Mr. THURMAN. Does the Senator want an answer right now?

Mr. MORTON. I would as soon have it now as any other time.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator has a short memory, or he would remember that I, as a very humble lieutenant of his, insisted three years ago upon a redistribution of the currency that would do justice to the West and to the South; and that at this very session, when I spoke on this other bill in the brief remarks that I made, I insisted that that redistribution ought to take place, and that that bill should be passed for that purpose. Now I understand the Senator from Indiana to abandon totally that redistribution, and to go for inflating the currency by making an addition to it instead of a redistribution of it. He would leave all out that is out, with all the inequality of distribution—an inequality that will be monstrous even after he has inflated by $46,000,000. The $46,000,000 do not begin to measure the inequality of distribution. He would leave that inequality of distribution to exist, and inflate I do not know how much—$46,000,000 or $100,000,000, for aught I know.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, we are arriving, somewhat slowly and with a little difficulty, at the Senator's position. If I understand the effect of his last remarks, it is this, that he is opposed to any extension or increase of national banking facilities, but is in favor of a redistribution of the bank currency between the States East and West and South. He says the $46,000,000 proposition of my friend from North Carolina will not begin to do it. Therefore, if he is in favor of redistribution and equalizing in that way, he is in favor, I suppose, of taking $70,000,000 or $80,000,000 from New England and redistributing that in the West and South. That is about where the Senator lands upon this question, and I was not complaining of his position at all; I simply wanted to know what it was. If the Senator has any hope of that being accomplished, be it so. I do not complain of his position; I am glad to know what the Senator's position is, that we shall equalize by redistribution. But he says himself that forty-six millions will not come anywhere near it. I believe the calculation has been made to show that it will require some seventy-five millions to equalize simply by redistribution, by taking from six or seven States in the East their excess and dividing it among the States West and South. I am not complaining at all. I simply want to know where my friend stands, because we take an interest in knowing what his position is.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-eight minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 24, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. HYDE. I ask the House to proceed with the unfinished business. I call up the contested-election case from Georgia of Sloan vs. Rawls, which is the unfinished business.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I rise to correct the Journal. The motion I made yesterday for leave to amend the executive, legislative, and judicial appropriation bill is recorded as having passed by unanimous consent, when the motion was distinctly made to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. Is it a correction of the Journal or of the RECORD?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Of the Journal. The RECORD shows that it was a motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The motion was for the suspension of the rules, but was agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. NEGLEY. I rise to a question of privilege. I am recorded as not voting on one of the amendments to the $400,000,000 bill yesterday.

The SPEAKER. In the RECORD or in the Journal?

Mr. NEGLEY. In the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. CONGER. Yesterday, in announcing the absence of my colleague, Mr. BURROWS, I took occasion to add "If here he would vote in the affirmative." The RECORD says he would vote "no."

The SPEAKER. Does the Journal say anything about it?

Mr. CONGER. The Journal would not record that.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen must not confound errors of the RECORD with errors of the Journal. A correction of the RECORD is not a correction of the Journal at all.

Mr. CONGER. I take it for granted that the print of the RECORD laid before the House is some authority.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman rose to a correction of the Journal and then proposes to correct what is in the RECORD.

Mr. CONGER. I took it for granted if the RECORD is wrong we have the right to correct it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has alluded to a fact which would not appear upon the Journal at all.

Mr. CONGER. Of course not; and so I stated.

The SPEAKER. There ought not to be an impression created there as an error in the Journal, when the Journal has nothing to do with it.

Mr. CONGER. I said this would not appear on the Journal, and therefore desire to correct the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman addresses the Chair as having a correction in the Journal. The Chair feels sensitive about the Journal and about the reputation of the clerks, and points must not be raised on the Journal about matters which do not belong to the Journal. Errors of the RECORD and errors of the Globe have never been held to be a question of privilege, although the Chair has always recognized gentlemen to make such corrections. An error of the Journal is a question of the highest privilege, and is one which affects the reputation for business exactness of the House.

Mr. CONGER. I desired to make the correction because I was sensitive about the reputation of other officers of the House, to wit, the reporters.

The SPEAKER. It is not a question of privilege, but the Chair of course entertains it.

Mr. MAYNARD. What is the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. It is the election case which the gentleman from Missouri has called up.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to offer a resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. I object, unless I have the same privilege. I make my objection absolute.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman rise to a correction of the Journal?

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. I do. I desire to correct the vote on the final passage of the $400,000,000 bill. I am recorded as not voting; I voted in favor of the bill. I ask that the Journal be corrected.

The SPEAKER. The Journal will be corrected in that regard.

in the Associated Press report of the vote upon the $400,000,000 bill

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, some twenty-six names are omitted passed yesterday.

The SPEAKER. That is extending it a little too far. [Laughter.] Some gentleman will next be bringing up a county newspaper that has not the vote correctly recorded. The Chair cannot entertain these questions about the reports of the Associated Press.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HYDE] is upon the floor to bring up a question of the highest privilege known to the House, the right of a gentleman to his seat.

Mr. O'NEILL and Mr. MYERS rose.

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order.

The House having come to order,

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] rise?

Mr. MYERS. I was called to Philadelphia late on Saturday evening, and returned on Sunday night in order to vote for the $400,000,000 bill, which was passed yesterday. To my surprise my name is omitted in the affirmative votes in the morning papers of Washington.

The SPEAKER. What has that to do with the business of the House?

Mr. MYERS. I ask the privilege to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Pennsylvania making a statement?

Mr. MAYNARD. I object.

Mr. MYERS. The Associated Press reporter, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Objection has been made to the gentleman proceeding. When the regular order is called it is the duty of the Chair to enforce it, and any gentleman who seeks to obtrude himself against the call of the regular order does so against the rules of the House.

Mr. MYERS. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement personal to myself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again submit the question. Is there objection to the gentleman from Pennsylvania making a statement personal to himself?

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman gets that privilege it would give him an hour.

Mr. HYDE. I object.

Mr. MYERS. I shall ask the privilege at another time.

Mr. McNULTA. The Committee on Indian Affairs have instructed me to ask the unanimous consent of the House——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HYDE] yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr McNULTA] for this?

Mr. HYDE. I do not yield for anything.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman should resume the floor and hold it.

Mr. McNULTA. I ask the gentleman to give me time to make a brief statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HYDE] asked the Chair to recognize him as soon as the Journal was read, for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the Georgia election case. The Chair did so recognize the gentleman, but the gentleman from Missouri does not seem disposed to go on with it.

Mr. HYDE. I do; and call for the regular order.

GEORGIA ELECTION CONTEST—SLOAN vs. RAWLS.

The House resumed the consideration of the following resolution reported from the Committee on Elections:

Resolved, That Hon. Morgan Rawls is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the first congressional district of Georgia in the Forty-third Congress.

Resolved, That Hon. Andrew Sloan is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the first congressional district of Georgia in the Forty-third Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has twenty minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. HYDE. I give notice that as soon as the gentleman from Georgia has occupied his twenty minutes I shall call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is entitled to the floor for twenty minutes.

Mr. COX. I ask that the House may come to order. The House seems demoralized to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair quite agrees with the gentleman. The gentleman from Georgia will proceed when the House is in order. He will please resume his seat until that time, which the Chair will indicate.

The House having been brought to order,

Mr. BLOUNT resumed and concluded his remarks begun last Saturday. The entire speech is as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I deem it proper, before discussing directly the testimony and the law governing this case, to call the attention of the House to the law of Georgia as to the qualifications of voters, and also to the poll-tax which is a part of it; also the disposition of that poll-tax, and what constitutes the educational fund of the State. I do this for the reason that I find an impression prevailing in the press of the country (which has even gone into the room of the Committee on Elections) that the laws of Georgia require each person to pay a poll-tax of ten dollars. I wish to show the liberality of the State of Georgia in this direction toward the education of the colored people, and the equity of the provisions under which our elections have been held.

Section 5021 of our code provides that—

No poll-tax shall be levied except for educational purposes, and such tax shall not exceed one dollar annually on each poll, and shall go to the general school fund.

Then as to the qualifications of electors, which is in section 5027:

Every male person born in the United States, and every male person who has been naturalized, or who has legally declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, twenty-one years old or upward, who shall have resided in this State six months next preceding the election, and shall have resided thirty days in the county in which he offers to vote, and shall have paid all taxes which may have been required of him, and which he may have had an opportunity of paying, agreeably to law, for the year preceding the elections, (except as hereinafter provided,) shall be deemed an elector; and every male citizen of the United States, of the age aforesaid, (except as hereinafter provided,) who may be a resident of the State at the time of the adoption of this constitution, shall be deemed an elector, and shall have all the rights of an elector as aforesaid.

Now, sir, I would here remark that this provision in regard to electors has been inserted in every constitution which has existed in Georgia from the organization of the State down to the present time. I read also the provision in our constitution with reference to the educational fund. Section 5134 of the code provides as follows:

The poll-tax allowed by this constitution, any educational fund now belonging to this State—except the endowment of and debt due to the State University—or that may hereafter be obtained in any way, a special tax on shows and exhibitions, and on the sale of spirituous and malt liquors, which the General Assembly is hereby authorized to assess, and the proceeds from the commutation for militia service, are hereby set apart and devoted to the support of common schools. And if the provision herein made shall at any time prove insufficient, the General Assembly shall have power to levy such general tax upon the property of the State as may be necessary for the support of said school system. And there shall be established, as soon as practicable, one or more common schools in each school district in this State.

Section 1272 of the code provides:

The public-school fund of this State shall be raised as follows:

All the poll-tax which shall be levied and collected in the State, and all tax on liquors, and on shows and exhibitions, dividends upon the stock of the State in the Bank of State of Georgia, Bank of Augusta, and Georgia Railroad and Banking Company, and such other means or moneys as now by law belong to the school fund, one-half of the proceeds of the Western and Atlantic Railroad, and such other sums of money as the Legislature shall from time to time raise, by taxation or otherwise, for that purpose, shall constitute a fund which shall be used for the support of the public schools of this State, and whenever any of the legal bonds of this State shall be purchased by the State or its authority, and shall be returned to the treasury and canceled or destroyed, and whenever any of the bonds of the State shall be paid off—except bonds which are paid out of moneys raised by the sale of new bonds, or bonds exchanged for new bonds—it shall be the duty of the governor to issue the bonds of this State in the same amount as shall be paid off, or purchased, or canceled; which said new bonds shall be payable to the school fund of this State, and shall be added to and constitute a part of said school fund.

Now, sir, it will be observed, in the first place, that the poll-tax is limited to one dollar. It will be observed, further, that a large sum of money is appropriated under the constitution and laws of Georgia for educational purposes. I have read these provisions for the additional purpose merely of showing that the people of our State have been disposed to deal justly with the colored people.

Mr. WALLS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have but a short time. This debate is restricted, and I propose to conduct the discussion in my own way. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. WALLS. I simply wish to ask a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, in the chair.) The gentleman from Georgia declines to yield.

Mr. BLOUNT. Now, sir, I shall come directly to the report of the majority in this case. That report declares that, counting all the votes in the office of the secretary of state, Mr. Sloan is elected. How they fell into this error I do not know, but the evidence in this case discloses the contrary to be true.

On page 31 the vote which it appears was not counted by the committee is that of the two hundred and fifty-fourth district, Scriven County. This gives to Mr. Sloan 34, and to Mr. Rawls 6. Counting this vote, Mr. Rawls has a majority in the office of the secretary of state. I do not claim that shall determine this question.

Mr. HYDE. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the exhibit on page 278 of the record, where, under date of January 9, 1873, it is shown from the secretary of state's office that Mr. Sloan has a majority of the votes in that office.

Mr. BLOUNT. The return from this precinct came in subsequently, and is certified to by a different secretary of state. I reply to the gentleman in that way, as the committee seem to regard it of some importance.

Now, the next precincts to which they direct attention are those outside of Savannah, the Isle of Hope, &c. Let us examine the order of the ordinary on this subject. It is as follows:

Court of ordinary, Chatham County, sitting for county purposes.

OCTOBER 22, 1868.

It being necessary that election precincts should be established in the county in order to facilitate the election to be held on the 3d day of November next, it is therefore ordered that election precincts be, and they are hereby, established at Cherokee Hill, in the eighth militia district, embracing the whole of said district, at Chapman's house in the seventh militia district, embracing the whole of said district, and on the Isle of Hope, embracing the whole of the fifth and sixth militia districts.

HENRY S. WETMORE,
Ordinary Chatham County.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the ordinary in this case has testified as to what his purpose was at that time. Then there is no question about his belonging to the republican party. Subsequent elections occurred when he belonged to the republican party. They have uniformly regarded these election precincts as simply established for temporary purposes. It may be singular to this House that such a thing was done, but it is not so with us. We have been accustomed to things not being done by a general law or by a general order, but done especially for the occasion. Every single witness—Mr. Shetfall on pages 19, 20, 21, and 22, Mr. Elsinger, Mr. Quinan, Mr. Hart, Mr. Russell, Mr. Watts, Mr. Stone, and Mr. Dickson—all these witnesses, have testified to this fact: that elections have never been held except on this one occasion in these precincts, and that they were never regarded as election precincts except for one election.

But, sir, if there were any doubt on this question, whatever may have governed the consolidated managers in determining whether these were valid precincts or not does not govern this House. We are here to investigate the law and facts in this case.

Now, sir, in 1870, you find a singular election law passed. The act goes on to provide, very strangely, for an election of three days; that the managers shall be appointed by the governor, (who, by the way, has run away from our State;) and it further provides, voters shall not be challenged. It makes no difference under these statutes what may be the qualifications of a voter; it makes no difference whether or not he had paid his taxes; It makes no difference what the law is: they are to come in and vote under this act, and the man who challenges their right does it at his peril. It provides for the manner of holding the elections entirely different from what has been done before. It requires their vote shall be polled at the county site. When that law was passed we had other laws allowing elections to take place at these precincts. This law declares all laws militating against that act shall be abolished. Gentlemen say this is a special law. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is a special law in some respects, and in others it is general. It is an act to provide for holding an election, it is true, but it is also an act to amend the law of Georgia in relation to holding elections. If these precincts had not been destroyed by the peculiar character of this order, then this law certainly does it.

Then, again, you find the order of the ordinary in 1870, which has been already recited. That ordinary, by the by, at the time this was done, was not questioned as to his fidelity to the republican party. He published a notice to all the citizens to vote in the city.

But, sir, we are told there was a general law in 1871 which repealed this law and revived these precincts. This makes it necessary for me (and I regret I have not time to recite these things in detail) to give a brief history of the laws of the State of Georgia on the subject of precincts.

The first statute we ever had upon that subject required that parties should vote viva voce at the county seat. In the progress of time the Legislature enacted a law here and there, as asked for, establishing country precincts. This became exceedingly obnoxious to the people. They did not like the idea of the Legislature taking charge of such matters as this and legislating upon them. It was abandoned, and the power was conferred upon the ordinaries in the various counties of establishing and abolishing and changing election precincts. So great was the antipathy to it, sir, that a provision was inserted in the constitution of the State of Georgia itself to restrain it. I scarcely know, except from the statute-book, that such has been the history of this legislation, the change has been so long established.

The Legislature under these circumstances passed a law repealing the law of 1870, providing for the manner of holding elections, but did not propose to revive the precincts. I am borne out in this statement by the annotations of the party who prepared the pamphlet. It has been the uniform construction of that law, that while it restored the election regulations as understood before, it did not revive the precincts; for that was a subject which the Legislature did not pretend to control.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is that fixed in your constitution?

Mr. BLOUNT. It was in the constitution of 1860, not in that of 1866, as I have already stated.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Then they could not be revived?

Mr. BLOUNT. No, sir. This being the case in my own county, as in two other counties within my knowledge, in exact accordance with this construction we have gone on and had the ordinary pass orders upon this subject. Because of his failure to do it a riot occurred in our city, the news of which has even reached this Capitol; and since that time the ordinary has established the old precincts.

I take it, then, as unquestionably proved that these country votes were cast in violation of law. We are not here to inquire whether the ordinary of this county was a republican or a democrat. I was astounded at the way in which the gentleman who had charge of this election case threw this in continually after his beautiful opening about our duty to be guided in this investigation by the law and the facts, and about our being here for a judicial investigation. It is only because it has already been introduced that I have alluded to it at all.

The gentleman who has charge of this case on the part of the majority of the committee declared the supervisors were appointed by the district judge, and this was notice of an election at these precincts. Does any one have any notice of it? It is done quietly with a few custom-house officers and others. The public know nothing about it. It was afterward developed in the investigation of the case.

Mr. HYDE. I will ask the gentleman if it was not a public record of the court?

Mr. BLOUNT. So far as that is concerned, it is not pretended that any power vested in the district judge to create election precincts; and when he appointed them it was simply by request, and he had no force to establish precincts. It is further proved in the testimony of the ordinary in this case that Mr. Bryant, a strong partisan, a man who had figured prominently in our State politics, on the very evening prior to this election, understanding the status of this precinct just as it was understood by every witness who has been called upon to give any opinion on this subject, though these men had got a district judge to appoint these supervisors, went into the office of the ordinary and asked him to pass an order opening those precincts. And I challenge the gentleman to show a particle of proof on the part of any witness in the whole of this investigation, by the slightest intimation, that he thought this precinct already existed.

Election upon election has been held.

Sir, we are not responsible for these laws. They were passed by the gentleman's own party, and if in their attempt to make their way to success they have made some blunders, let them not charge them upon others.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. The gentleman has spoken several times over about these numerous elections held from 1868 to 1872. Were not all these elections, except that of 1870, held under military orders?

Mr. BLOUNT. No, sir.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I am informed they were; and further——

Mr. BLOUNT. I decline to yield further. The gentleman has been informed of a good deal for which there is no foundation, that has been injected by briefs and private partisan statements, that are prejudicial, and designed to be prejudicial, to the sitting member.

So far, then, as these precincts are concerned there was not, until this election, a man, woman, or child in Chatham County who ever dreamed that they existed. But if this House shall see fit to determine otherwise, we can bear it.

A great deal has been thrown in here as to intimidation. I propose to refer to that after awhile, and see what that amounts to.

The next precinct to which the committee direct their attention is the Lawtonville precinct.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman state the effect of leaving out the precinct of which he has just been speaking?

Mr. BLOUNT. That precinct, as appears by the evidence, gives Mr. Sloan between 1,200 and 1,300 votes. And just here, Mr. Speaker, I propose to show in what connection and for what purpose that election was held. I have read the law upon the subject of qualification of voters. It was a habit, and on this very occasion the record discloses it, that various parties went there with tax-receipts in their hands that were not the receipts of the tax-receivers, but were the receipts of custom-house officers not recognized by law. This was done also at the October elections.

Sir, whatever you may think about it, there is a large number of the colored people of Georgia who do not care much about voting. That is the truth, whether it is believed here or not. If a tax of one dollar is required as a preliminary to voting, many will forego the election altogether. Partisan leaders, knowing this, concluded it much cheaper to take buggies and go out to these so-called precincts and poll their votes where they could not be interrupted because the taxes had not been paid, where no one has notice of an election, and where circumstances indicate that the illegal votes will not be challenged. A great many votes are polled in that way.

Now it may be asked why it was that testimony was not produced here as to these facts. If we could have seen before we reached here what we see now, testimony would have been taken; but so firm was the conviction, so undisputed is the truth that these precincts did not exist, that the contestee relied upon proof of that fact, and has come here to this House relying upon it.

The next precinct to which I shall refer is the Lawtonville precinct. There 189 votes were cast for Sloan and 113 for Rawls. The fact there, as detailed by the evidence, was that while the election was pending and after the voting had been conducted for awhile, two of the managers went out, by agreement with the supervisor, and when they returned found one of the supervisors and one of the managers with the votes out of the ballot-box and upon the floor mixed with ballots not cast. And right here arises a question of conflict of testimony. The rule that would be regarded in a court of justice, and that ought to be regarded here, I think, clearly determines against the committee in their action in regard to this precinct. They insist upon counting the vote of that precinct. What are the facts? The supervisor, Dr. Young, who was the only witness who testified upon that side, stated that those managers went out with the purpose of not returning, and that he and the remaining manager were so anxious that what was right in the case should be done that they went forward in counting the votes. He goes on further to say that in the counting of the votes one of these managers was in the habit of calling out "Wheeler and Wilson," &c., and making a farce of it. You find afterward this same man going about hunting up negroes at their meetings and declaring that it was his interest that Sloan should be elected. That is one witness. Now as to these facts the other witnesses are two of the managers, who declare positively and in terms that every word of what Dr. Young testified is untrue. Now, sir, they are unimpeached; they exceed in number; they had no personal interest in the matter. How is this House to determine upon this matter? Here is one witness to two witnesses; the one witness is interested; the other two witnesses are disinterested; the one has been subsequently appointed to office. Now, sir, I ask gentlemen of the majority of the committee upon what principle in judicial investigation, upon these facts, they can accept the testimony of Dr. Young as the truth in determining the result?

I would ask the Chair how much time I have left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has thirty minutes.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then I must hurry on very rapidly; and I come next to the Jeffersonton precinct, in Camden County. In reference to that precinct there is no contradiction as to the testimony. It is simply a question as to its existence. It was established under an old law and under an old system. I do not suppose that a single voter in the county recollected the existence of the law; and no one knew of it until it was hunted up for the purposes of the election in this congressional district. Long since, in 1821, the county seat was brought to that place, and under the general law of the State it became a voting precinct by becoming the county seat, and the point to which the returns were all to be brought to be consolidated. The court-house, in 1870, was removed to Saint Mary's; and I contend that that removal carried with it the election precinct. Prior to that time it was, under the old law of 1821, an election precinct. That law, differing from the general law, required four managers of election, and required them to carry their returns to the county site. When Jeffersonton became the county seat, it was under the old law a voting precinct, but under the general law on the subject that statute became obsolete.

But, sir, there was an order, to which it may be proper to refer, in 1868, abolishing that precinct, though the county site was then at that place. That was clearly in violation of the law; that is to say, of the general law. It could not be done. But if that precinct had any character by reason of the law of 1821, the ordinary having just the same power as is claimed under that act, and having passed an order abolishing it, to that extent that order was valid.

Sir, this question has been before the Legislature of Georgia in a contested-election case, and the committee to whom the matter was referred made a report declaring that Jeffersonton was not an election precinct, and calling attention to the fact that in that very same militia district there was another election precinct established by the ordinary and observed by the people, and the law expressly limited the number of precincts to one in each militia district.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. The law established Saint Mary's as well as Jeffersonton as the county seat.

Mr. BLOUNT. Let that be true; if it established this precinct, and if it is in force by virtue of that act, the law which gave the ordinary power to abolish election precincts empowered him, under the order of 1868, to abolish this or any other precinct.

Now, sir, this being true, I take it that if we are engaged in a judicial investigation, if we are sitting here as a court, there will be no difficulty in any legal mind in disposing of the matter so far as this precinct is concerned.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HYDE] saw fit to say in regard to this matter that he did not care about it at all, that the house of representatives of the State of Georgia was largely democratic, and he did not intend to have their action regarded as authority. I think that the old maxim, "that people who live in glass houses should not throw stones," will apply here. The Georgia Legislature has seated a negro contestant, a republican, though that party was in the minority. That is more than has been done by this House, even giving all the meaning in a partisan sense you please to their action.

The gentleman also spoke of the great liberality of the majority of the committee in their report in this case; he said they were so liberal that we could make no complaint. Well, sir, I could have appreciated th at liberality a little more, and I would not say a word further in this discussion, if it were not for what the gentleman proceeded to say right afterward. I quote from his speech, as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, as my time has about expired, I will, in conclusion, only call the attention of the House to the recapitulation of the vote on pages 12 and 13 of the majority report as printed. It will there be seen that, counting the votes actually on file in the office of the secretary of state, and to which he has certified, Mr. Sloan had a majority of 12 votes. But adding the votes of the other precincts, which I think I have clearly shown Mr. Sloan is entitled to, he has a majority of 136 votes. I say that the committee has been liberal to Mr. Rawls; they have not rejected at least 700 or 800 votes which, if you were to give a strict construction to the law, they would be required to reject from his vote; and I say candidly I should vote to reject them if it were necessary to the decision of this case. I believe that this majority of only 136 for Mr. Sloan has been reduced to that number by counting several hundred votes for the sitting member, which, according to the law and according to a fair construction of the rules of evidence, he is not entitled to, and would not receive if this question was to be tried in any court of justice. But as it was not necessary, as it made no difference in the result, as Mr. Sloan is elected even if you count all those votes, in order to avoid the possibility of complaint on the part of the sitting member and of his friends, the committee have counted them all, and yet Mr. Sloan is elected by a majority of 136 votes.

I cannot appreciate such liberality.

Mr. Speaker, I am aware that these election cases excite but little interest generally among members of this House. They are very fatiguing, and whatever attention and consideration are given to them by members, is given simply as a matter of duty.

I come now to the county of Bullock, which has so horrified the gentleman making this majority report. The testimony in this case discloses the fact that while the people have manifested little knowledge of the importance of observing the regulations in the conduct of this election, there is a chain of evidence in this case rebutting every presumption of fraud.

Mr. Speaker, I come to the issues in regard to Bullock County; and in dealing with them, I shall follow the method adopted by the gentleman who submitted the views of the majority. He called attention to the following as a principle of law governing this case:

> When the result in any precinct has been shown to be so tainted with fraud that the truth cannot be deducible therefrom, then it should never be permitted to form a part of the canvass. The precedents as well as the evident requirements of truth not only sanction, but call for the rejection of the entire poll, when stamped with the characteristics here shown.

The majority of the committee cite quite a number of authorities in support of this principle. I desire to refer the House to merely one of these, because the time I have does not permit me to review the whole of them. In regard to the case of Washburn vs. Voorhees, I read from the Digest of Election Cases from 1865 to 1871, as follows:

The official return from this township was (page 7) for Mr. Voorhees, 498; for Mr. Washburn, 143. The allegation of the contestant is, that the ballot-box at this precinct had been tampered with, so that the return does not state the true poll, and that the whole proceeding was "so tainted with fraud that the truth cannot be deduced therefrom;" and he accordingly demands, in accordance with the rule already stated, that the return be set aside. The evidence offered in support of this allegation will be found on pages 8–49, inclusive, and is of two kinds: first to show how many voters actually cast their votes at this precinct for the contestant; and secondly, evidence tending to show an actual tampering with the ballot-box after the close of the polls and before the count was completed. The evidence satisfies the committee that 170 men at least voted for the contestant at this precinct. One hundred and sixty-four witnesses testified to their own votes for him, and as to the remaining 6 not present, the testimony of witnesses that they knew the vote of each to be also for the contestant, left the committee entirely satisfied that this number at least had so voted. There was testimony tending to the same result as to several others, but not sufficiently positive to satisfy the committee. Here is thus shown a discrepancy between the official return for the contestant and the proof of the vote actually cast for him, at this precinct alone, of 27 votes. There was no attempt to show the discrepancy between the vote actually cast for the sitting member and the vote returned for him, nor was any attempt on the part of the sitting member made to explain this discrepancy in the vote for the contestant.

The tally-list would have shown whether these men had actually voted or not, and their old political associations and professions, if in conflict with their testimony, were legitimate evidence to contradict them. The tally-list would also have revealed, if true, 498 other names, if so many votes had been also actually cast for the sitting member, and some approximation to that number might have been found to have so testified. But the case was permitted by the sitting member to rest upon the uncontradicted testimony of the witnesses before stated, and the committee left to the conclusion to which that testimony, uncontrolled, must lead them.

In addition to this, the contestant offered testimony tending directly to show an actual tampering with the ballot-box at this precinct. This evidence will be found in Miscellaneous Document No. 11, pages 45–50 inclusive, and the attention of the House is called to it as there recorded in full. From this testimony it appears that at the opening of the polls in the morning a strenuous but ineffectual effort was made by the friends of the contestant to secure the appointment of one of their number as one of the officers of the election. This was resisted by the friends of the sitting member present at the polls. When several names were proposed for this purpose, a Mr. Hansil, leading in the opposition to it, got up on a store-box and spoke in very violent language against the one proposed. Another was then proposed, "or some other friend of the contestant." But Mr. Hansil replied that "he would not trust either of the men proposed, or any other black abolitionist, on the board." And so the board of three judges and two clerks was composed of all strong partisans of the sitting member. In this there was no violation of the letter of the law, but what subsequently happened to the ballot-box was made easy by the transaction, and it deserves notice in that connection alone.

I call attention to what happened subsequently to that as to interfering with the ballot-box:

When the polls were closed at night this board began the count about dusk, and counted some 15 or 20 votes, stringing them upon a string as required by law.

They then adjourned for supper, first putting the string of votes in the box on top of the uncounted votes, and the poll-books and tally-papers on top of them. The box was locked and a key given by the inspector to one of the judges. The box was then left on the table in the voting-room, and the officers were all gone about an hour to their supper, leaving the box they knew not in whose presence or to what treatment. On their return the key handed by the inspector to one of the judges would not unlock the box. Another was tried without success, when the inspector took a key from his pocket which unlocked the box. On opening the box and taking out the poll-books and tally-papers, the string of counted tickets which had been placed on top of the uncounted tickets was not there, and considerable search was made for it. It was at last found at the bottom of the box, under the uncounted tickets. The board of election officers, a few days after the election, published a card respecting this matter, which is here inserted entire:

"A card.—We, the undersigned, judges and clerks of the election held at the court-house in Sullivan, on the 11th day of October, 1864, in view of the frauds alleged to have been perpetrated, and in justice to ourselves, avail ourselves of this, the first opportunity offered, to make the following statement:

"Of the frauds charged we know nothing. We saw no act of impropriety by any member of the board while in session; but that we are satisfied in our own minds that such charges are not without foundation, and we have such opinion upon the following circumstance, to which we are willing at any and all times to be qualified: At the adjournment of the board for supper, which was about dusk, we had counted out between fifteen and twenty tickets, which were strung on a string prepared for that purpose. The string of tickets was placed in the ballot-box on top of the uncounted tickets. The poll-books and tally-papers were then placed on top of the tickets, the box locked, and set on a table in one corner of the room.

"When the board met, after supper, the ballot-box was unlocked in our presence by the inspector, the tally-papers and poll-books taken out, but the string of counted tickets could not be seen. The inspector turned to the table in the corner of the room to search for it, and while thus engaged we found the string of tickets in the bottom of the ballot-box, completely covered by uncounted tickets. We are satisfied that the string of tickets could not have got to the bottom of the ballot-box without the same being opened in our absence and the tickets handled.

"Respectfully submitted.

"I hereby certify that I believe the above statement to be correct. When the box was opened after supper I took out the poll-books and tally-papers, but could not find the string of tickets. Supposing they had been left out, I turned to look for them; meantime they were found in the box. It is evident that they were moved while the board was adjourned for supper.

The committee do not deem further comment upon this poll necessary. The discrepancy of 27 votes between the return (143) for the contestant and the number (170) proved to have voted for him; the violent partisan character of all the officers of election adversely to him; the steady purpose of keeping the box in such hands; the leaving it for an hour after dusk at the voting place unguarded and exposed, and finally the evidence that the box had been opened and an indefinite number of votes changed or abstracted, disclosed to the judges themselves—all compelled to the conviction that "the truth cannot be deduced from this return," and it is accordingly rejected.

But the rejection of a return does not necessarily leave the votes actually cast at a precinct uncounted. It only declares that the return having been shown to be false shall not be taken as true, and the parties are thrown back upon such other evidence as is in their power to show how many voted and for whom, so that the entire vote, if sufficient means be taken and the means are at hand, may be shown and not a single one be lost, notwithstanding the falsity of the return.

Now, sir, I will read, in addition to this, section 1362 of the code of Georgia; which is to this effect:

Election not void by reason of formal defects.—No election shall be defeated for non-compliance with the requirements of the law, if held at the proper time and place, by persons qualified to hold them, if it is not shown that by that non-compliance the result is different from what it would have been had there been a proper compliance.

In connection with the county of Bullock, the committee cited sections 1312, 1314, and 1315, relating to the manner of conducting elections. It is necessary, in order to give a proper construction to the election laws of Georgia, to consider in connection with those sections section 1334. By considering them together the conclusions arrived at by the majority of the committee are obviated.

Having called attention to all the law that I deem pertinent in relation to the Bullock County precincts, I desire to call attention to the testimony. It would be impossible for me to read the testimony of all the witnesses, and I shall therefore abstract only such responses as are necessary to this investigation. I read first from the testimony of Mr. C. A. Sorrier, ordinary of the county:

Question. Where do you reside?
Answer. In Bullock County, Georgia.
Q. Do you hold any official position in that county?
A. I do not at this time.
Q. Have you held any official position in that county? If so, state what was that position or office, and how long did you hold the same?
A. I held the office of ordinary from 1868 to 1873.
Q. Did you assist in the holding or the managing of an election, as ordinary, in Bullock County, on the 5th day of November, 1872, at which presidential electors and a member of the Forty-third Congress were voted for?
A. I did.
Q. What duties did you perform connected with said election?
A. I assisted the managers, fixed up the papers, consolidated the returns, and sent them to the executive department at Atlanta.
Q. What did that consolidation consist of?
A. It consisted of the several returns from the county.

The House will mark that in this was included, not only the precincts that have been admitted by the committee, but also the forty-fifth precinct, which they have rejected. I read further from the testimony:

Question. Did you sign any managers' names to that consoli datedreturn? If so, by whose authority did you sign their names?
Answer. I did sign the names of managers, by their authority or request.
Q. Is it customary for the ordinary to assist in the holding and managing of elections, and of making up the consolidated return of elections in Bullock County, and sending it forward to the secretary of state or the executive department?
(Counsel for contestant objects to this question on the ground that such a custom as is inquired about is not legal.)
A. It has always been the custom since I have been in office.
Q. Were the precinct or district returns of said election all brought in for consolidation by, or before, twelve o'clock m. on the day after said election?
A. They were brought to the court-house before twelve o'clock the day after the election.

Here is the evidence of Mr. Sorrier that the return which is here in this evidence certified to by the secretary of state is the same return that he consolidated and made up.

At this point I ask the attention of the House to the following portion of the report of the majority of the committee:

Another most significant fact in this connection is the failure to turn over the ballots, returns, tally-sheets, and lists of voters to the clerk of the superior court, as required by the laws of Georgia, before referred to.

And then they quote this single sentence from the testimony of Mr. Sanders, the clerk of the superior court: "Nothing outside of the ballot-box was deposited in the office." I desire to call the attention of the House to the testimony of Mr. Sanders to show how unfair that statement is. I do not mean that there was any intention on the part of the committee to be unfair; but I desire to show how unfair it is in truth that this statement should be taken from the testimony of Mr. Sanders. I read from it:

Question. Were the ballots cast at your precinct, and at the other voting places in this county at said election, ever deposited in your office or delivered to you; and, if so, when and by whom?
Answer. I know nothing except that the ballot-box at the court-house was deposited in my office. I have not examined its contents; the ballots at my precinct were sealed up and sent to the court-house.
Q. Were the returns, tally-sheet, and list of voters at your precinct, and at the other voting places in the county at said election, ever deposited in your office; and, if so, when and by whom?
A. I have the same answer to make as in the other question; the tally-sheet and list of voters from my precinct were sent up to the court-house with the returns; I suppose that was done from the other precincts, but do not know this from personal knowledge.
Q. Was any consolidated return of said election in this county ever deposited in your office, or delivered to you; and, if so, when and by whom?
A. Nothing outside the ballot-box.

Then upon his cross-examination is the following:

Q. Have you ever examined your office to know if all the returns of said election are deposited therein, or could you, were you to examine, know this fact without breaking open sealed packages?
A. I have not examined my office. I do not suppose I could know unless I broke open the packages.

Q. Was the election at your precinct conducted under the usual mode of conducting elections? Was the crowd quiet and every man entitled to vote permitted to do so?

A. It was conducted in the usual manner; the crowd was quiet, and every man permitted to vote who was entitled to do so; all the votes for Congress were for Mr. Rawls.

I ask attention now to the testimony of Mr. Beasley:

Question. Where you manager at an election in this county for presidential electors and member of the Forty-third Congress, on the 5th of November last; and, if so, at what precinct?

Answer. I was, at the forty-eighth militia district.

Q. Who were your fellow-managers at that election?

A. John R. Miller and Matthew Miller.

Q. Was a return of that election made up?

A. It was.

Q. State what was done with that return?

A. It was brought to the court-house by me; the return lists and ballots were brought together; this was done on the evening of the election; it was delivered to the ordinary, Mr. Sorrier, and by him put into the court-house ballot-box.

Then follows his cross-examination:

Q. Were the managers at the court-house present when you gave your returns to Mr. Sorrier?

A. I walked in with the returns, and found Mr. Sorrier in the court-house near the ballot-box and handed them to him. If my mind serves me right they were counting out and the managers present. I do not recollect who the managers were.

John Green testifies that he was one of the managers at the forty-fifth militia district, and that he brought in the returns. I pass on over the testimony of others in relation to the same district, all to the effect that the election was conducted fairly and that proper returns were made to the county seat. Then I come to the testimony of Mr. Proctor, who tells you that the ballots were deposited after the counting of the votes in the ballot-box by the ordinary, and were then turned over to the clerk of the court.

I think it was exceedingly unfair for the committee to have simply reported that the clerk of the superior court testified that nothing outside of the ballot-box was deposited in his office, when they had before them the testimony of various witnesses connected with the election that the ballots, the tally-sheets, and all the papers properly belonging to an election, were deposited in the ballot-box, and the box carried to the office of the clerk, and there deposited.

Mr. HYDE. I now call the previous question.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the gentleman to allow me five minutes more to submit a few remarks in regard to Chatham County.

Mr. SPEER. The sitting member and the contestant both would like to be heard for half an hour each. I ask unanimous consent that time be given them for that purpose.

Mr. HYDE. It was my understanding, when the present arrangement was made for one hour to the side of the sitting member, that he was to occupy that time himself. This election case has been up for several days, and has been crowded off by other business. I know if any extension of time is made before the previous question is called this case will not be decided to-day. I must, therefore, insist upon the previous question now.

Mr. SPEER. Then I hope the House will not second the call.

The question was taken upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 79, noes 64.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, and Mr. SPEER called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HYDE and Mr. SPEER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 95, noes 65.

So the previous question was seconded; and the main question was then ordered.

Mr. SPEER. I now ask unanimous consent of the House that an hour be given to the parties in this case—half an hour to the sitting member, and half an hour to the contestant—to be heard before the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman mean in addition to the hour belonging to the Committee on Elections?

Mr. SPEER. In addition to that hour.

Mr. HYDE. I desire to say that there have been two hours spent upon the other side, and only one upon this side.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object.

Mr. HYDE. I now yield half an hour to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. PIKE,] a member of the committee.

Mr. PIKE. As a member of the Committee on Elections I desire to say a few words to the House upon this question. I am myself fully convinced that the seat for the first congressional district of Georgia belongs to the contestant. That conviction arises from a considerable examination of this case. I hope that the belief which I have expressed is not the result of my political opinion; I hope that the conviction is the result of a judgment independent of political considerations.

I will come directly to the question. There were 1,241 votes cast in the county of Chatham; 1,239 of those were for the contestant, and 2 for the sitting member. The minority of the committee in their report exclude all the votes from the three precincts at which these 1,241 votes were cast. The question is, should they be counted in favor of the contestant or not? The three precincts of Chatham County at which those votes were cast are known as Cherokee Hill, Chapman's house, and Isle of Hope.

Now, it is well, in the discussion of a question, to know what there is in controversy between the parties. I have heard no objection raised—certainly there was none in the committee and I have heard none on this floor—to these 1,241 votes on the ground that they were not legal votes. It has not been asserted, so far as I know, that any person casting any of these votes had not the legal right to vote. But it is claimed that the counting of these votes rests entirely upon the question whether or not these three precincts were legal precincts. It is urged in behalf of the sitting member that they were not legal precincts, and for what reason? First, that the precincts were established to exist only at a particular election. It is not in controversy here that they were legally established. They were established in 1868 and by legal action. But it is said they were born to live only a day; that they expired at the end of that election.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if there is anything in all the world, pertaining to elections, about which there should be certainty, it is the time and place at which elections are to be held. These precincts were legally established; and unless there are some certain, definite words in the order establishing them, by which they were to cease to exist with the election of November 3, 1868, it must follow that they continue to exist.

Mr. FORT. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the order establishing those election precincts was not a special order, confined to the election of a certain day of a certain year, and whether those precincts were ever used for election purposes after that year until this election, at which the sitting member and contestant were voted for?

Mr. PIKE. The majority of the committee say that they were not established for that particular election only. The order establishing them recites it being necessary that other election precincts should be established to facilitate the election upon the 3d of November, therefore certain precincts are established. Now, if you go through the orders establishing election precincts in Georgia, (and I have examined very many of them—every one that has come to my knowledge,) I venture to say that in every one of those orders will be found a recitation somewhat like the one in this case; yet in not a single instance in that State has such a recital in the order been regarded as limiting the establishment of the precincts to the election immediately following. There is just as much reason to say that one-half the election precincts in Georgia ceased to exist at the election following the time when they were established, as to say that such was the case as to these three precincts.

Mr. HEREFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman—it is only a repetition of the question asked a few moments ago by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT]—whether there was any election at those three precincts from 1868 up to the time of the election now in controversy?

Mr. PIKE. I understand that there was not.

Mr. HEREFORD. There was no election, then, at all at those precincts from 1868 up to the time of the election?

Mr. SMITH, of New York. But the reason is——

Mr. HEREFORD. I merely wished to call attention to the fact that from 1868 up to the present time——

Mr. PIKE. If the gentleman wants to make a speech, I hope he will wait his turn. I yielded for a question; I do not desire to yield for a speech. If the gentleman wishes an honest answer, I will try to give it; if he does not, that is another thing.

These precincts were established at the presidential and congressional election of 1868. There was no other presidential election until 1872 at which there was a vote; and there was no other election, as I understand, besides one a month before, except in 1870, and that was an election by a special provision and a special statute; and at the very next presidential election, at the very next congressional election, after these precincts were established and at which there was voting for the first time, there was voting again at these precincts. I say that the election for Congress in 1870 was the result of a special statute, which overrode all other statutes; and at this election of 1870 three days were allowed for voting in that county; whereas in the other case only one day was given.

Now, it was first urged that these precincts expired with the election following——

Mr. LAMAR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. PIKE. If it does not take too much time I will hear the question.

Mr. LAMAR. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the special statute to which he refers could have had, either directly or indirectly, any such effect as is claimed under the constitution of the State of Georgia, which provides that—

The General Assembly shall have no power to grant corporate powers, &c., nor to make or to change election precincts.

So that, where a precinct had been established under a general law, no special act of the Legislature could operate to repeal or change that precinct.

Mr. PIKE. I claim just that. I claim that the statute of 1870 did not abolish those precincts. That is precisely my position. I claim that it could not have done so, because the statute of 1870 was not intended to affect them, and does not; that, the precincts being legally established in 1868, the law of 1870 did not interfere with them; that, having a legal existence, they were subsisting and continuous, the law of 1870 by its terms in no way touching them.

Now, it has been urged—it is urged in the minority report—that the law of 1870 abolishes these precincts. First, it was said that they expired by their own limitation; that the seeds of speedy mortality were in them, and they only lived to the mature age of twenty-four hours.

Then, again, it was said they were abolished by the law of 1870. Well, now, if they were, then one-half the precincts, or three-quarters of the precincts, in the State of Georgia were also abolished.

Mr. BLOUNT. Was it not in the power of the ordinary, under the law, to establish precincts?

Mr. PIKE. Of course it was in the power of the ordinary to establish precincts. He established these very precincts where this voting took place. We claim it was in his power; he exercised that power, but he did not exercise it by limiting it. He did not say it should only exist for twenty-four hours. It is claimed he might abolish these precincts by subsequent order, but we say he did not until after the election, and then he did.

Mr. BLOUNT. But the gentleman does not answer my question. He assumes they were all abolished by the act.

Mr. PIKE. I am not assuming any such thing. I say they were never abolished until the ordinary abolished them after the election of 1872.

Mr. BLOUNT. But hear my question.

Mr. PIKE. Do not ask too many.

Mr. BLOUNT. You are drawing the conclusion that this act abolishing these precincts leaves the State of Georgia without one-half of her voting precincts.

Mr. PIKE. I do not say that. I say if the position of the minority of the committee in their report, that the law of 1870 abolished these precincts, is correct, then not only these precincts but two-thirds of the precincts in the State of Georgia are abolished. That is what I say.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it not the province of the ordinary, and was it not his duty, to establish them?

Mr. PIKE. There is no need to re-establish them until they are abolished. We say that they were never abolished. We say the law of Georgia of 1870 did not abolish them; that having been established by the proper tribunal they could not be abolished unless by some definite and positive act, either legislative or judicial. The idea that the voting-precincts in the State of Georgia exist by judicial construction, that the place where and the time when elections shall be held shall depend upon vague judicial construction or upon political construction, which is worse, is an idea I do not want to entertain as a member of this House and of the Committee on Elections. It is an idea which I will not sanction.

Our position is this: that these precincts were legally established, and that the law of 1870 did not abolish them. It does not assume to abolish them. There are no terms of the law which are made to apply to them. If that law applies to any one of them, it applies then to all the precincts in the State of Georgia not held at court-houses or in organized towns or cities, which are three-quarters of the precincts in that State. At this election voting was had at three-quarters of the precincts in the State, standing precisely upon the same ground with those Chatham County precincts, a vote which the minority of this committee now seek to rule out. That is my position, and I hope I am now understood.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say the order recites there was necessity for the establishment of these precincts. The necessity was abundant, and it not only existed then, but it existed with more power that they should be continuous. If there was some temporary reason, some reason which existed pertaining to that election only, why these precincts should be established, then there would be some color to the construction which is asked, that they came to an end with that election; but, sir, the necessity was continuous.

Mr. FORT. I ask the gentleman if the words of the order will indicate an election precinct was established at all? Does it not appear that a special election should be held there?

Mr. PIKE. No, sir.

Mr. FORT. In fact, has there been any election held there since?

Mr. PIKE. I answered that question once already, and if the gentleman had paid attention he would have heard it. I answered it just as I understood the fact to be. The order is this: "Therefore ordered, election precincts be, and are hereby, established," &c.

Now, here is the county of Chatham, just about as large as the county in which I vote and where I live in New Hampshire, containing just about the same number of inhabitants—about 42,000 in each—a little less in one and a little more in the other. The minority of this committee claim there should be only one voting place in this county of Chatham; where the circumference is from twelve or fifteen miles from the center, that there should be only one voting place.

Now, in 1868 that fact existed, that there was only one polling place for a population of 42,000, and with a voting population of nearly 10,000. These three precincts were established to meet this great exigency, to wit, the aggregation of 10,000, or from 8,000 to 10,000, voters at one place on one election day. Now, my county, with a voting population hardly any greater, has thirty-one voting places; yet the minority of this committee would claim that the necessity did not exist to have this established and continue for only one election. Why, sir, where do we find frauds at elections if not in these large places where the votes are aggregated together? Where do we hear of frauds and of proceedings which are disgraceful to the locality, and disgraceful to our institutions, if not at places like those of all others?

Now, how is it in regard to those three precincts which the minority seek to exclude? What is the population in those precincts? Why, in one there are almost 6,000 inhabitants; in another almost 5,000, and in another almost 3,000; leaving the city of Savannah, with a population of 28,000 or 30,000, as another.

Then, I say, Mr. Speaker, there was every reason why this order should have been made; and there is no reason existing in the circumstances surrounding it from which it could be construed as being limited to that election.

I know that the minority called in Mr. Wetmore, the ordinary, who established these additional precincts, to say that he did not intend it to exist except during that election. He says that, and he was afterward brought in to swear it. My friend, the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] says that Mr. Wetmore was a republican when he did this.

Mr. BLOUNT. It was the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HYDE] who spoke on the part of the majority who said it.

Mr. PIKE. And the gentleman from Georgia said it too. I do not know but he was. He has always been a changeable man. He has now got on the other side, and I do not know where he may go next; but he may probably join this new school of eclectic politicians.

Now, let us see if he understood that the orders for these precincts were to expire with that election. If he meant that, why did he not say so? Why did he not make it certain? Why did he not put one single word into his order that would indicate that? Why did he make the order almost precisely like all the orders establishing election precincts in Georgia? I think if he had understood it so he would have said so; and when he did not say that, it is an evidence that he did not intend it.

Mr. BROMBERG. Have those precincts ever been used to vote at since 1868?

Mr. PIKE. I have been asked that question before, and have answered it more than once.

Mr. BROMBERG. How did you answer it?

Mr. PIKE. I answered it by saying that there was not any election in Georgia between 1868 and this election, except the one in 1870, and that was a special one.

Mr. LAMAR. The gentleman is mistaken as to that. There were three elections.

Mr. PIKE. There was no congressional election, and no presidential election except the one under this special statute, between those dates. But what has that to do with the case? The question is, had the precincts a legal existence?

Mr. SPEER. Will my friend permit me to remind him that there were two elections for governor between 1868 and 1872, one of which was special, and at neither was there any voting at these precincts?

Mr. PIKE. I have said that there was one about a month before, where there was no voting at these precincts, and the other was a special election. And I hope now, since gentlemen have repeated that over a dozen times, that they will let me go on.

The committee had serious doubts whether the voting at Savannah should not all be set aside. The law of the United States, if it means anything, means that there should be supervisors appointed at every voting place—two supervisors at every polling place. And an election precinct was understood by national law to be one voting place with one box.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him once more, and I will not trouble him again?

Mr. PIKE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLOUNT. I call attention to the enforcement act, where, on page 3, there are allusions to several boxes. And I call attention to section 8, on page 4 of that act, where there is authority for having several assistant marshals to aid in the counting of the votes.

Mr. PIKE. Why call attention to that, when everybody has heard it in the gentleman's speech?

Mr. BLOUNT. I want to see how the gentleman will meet it.

Mr. PIKE. I will do so, if the gentleman will permit me.

I say that it was the intention of the national law that there should be two supervisors appointed at every voting precinct, that is, at every box where votes were cast. Three managers were required by the law of Georgia, and under the United States law two supervisors, one of one party and the other of the other. That was the meaning of the national law; and to circumvent it, to evade the effect of it, what did they do at this same voting place at the court-house of Savannah, in the county of Chatham? Why, they had four boxes so far apart that the supervisors could not see how the voting was going on except at one box, and in that way the national law was rendered entirely nugatory and void.

The chief supervisor of the southern district of Georgia makes a report, which was in evidence before the committee, in which he says that it was impossible for the supervisors at the polls to see but one box, and thus the national law was disregarded and flung in their faces.

But the committee counted those votes, and why? Although the national law was disregarded and although the committee believed that it was intentionally disregarded, and that this device of four boxes was resorted to for the purpose of disregarding it, yet they counted the votes cast, because it was in evidence that every man who went to vote there went there honestly, and we thought that the expression of the will of the voters should be given; therefore we counted the votes cast there as we did the votes in the precincts about which I have been talking.

I wish to say a word now about the vote in Bullock County. There there was an utter disregard of their duties by the officers who had anything to do with the vote. The law provides that the votes shall be consolidated in the county by the action of one of the managers from each of the voting precincts in the county; that they shall consolidate the votes and make an abstract of them, and send two copies of that abstract, one to the county seat and one to the seat of government. What was done in this county? Why, sir, the votes were all put in the custody of—whom? Of the officers into whose custody the law required them to be put? No, sir; they were put into the hands of a private individual, who had legally nothing more to do with the votes than any one of us, and they were kept by him. The law requires that the ballots, the tally lists, and the voting lists should all be kept and returned to the county court. The record shows that they were inquired for, but no one could get them. The testimony of all the men that were there has been taken, and all that has been known of those votes at that precinct is that they were in the hands of one Sorrier, a lawyer, and friend and counsel of the sitting member, and they have never seen daylight since. No friend of the contestant has been permitted to see them.

Now, I do not want better evidence of fraud or intention to defraud than the fact that the votes are taken from the custody of the officers appointed by law and put where the law does not put them, and are kept there. It furnishes means and opportunities for fraud; and whether fraud was committed in this case or not, we say that all the safeguards which the law has thrown around the polls were stricken down in this instance.

Now, what does this Sorrier do? Why, he consolidated the returns; he sat down and made them up alone, and signed the names of every one of the managers to the abstract. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT,] says that they consented. I say that they were called upon the stand—and their testimony is before us—and all but one of them deny that they knew anything about it, and say that if their names were attached to the return it was a forgery. That is the testimony in this case. Now, my friends of the minority think that that was all right, and that everything was just as it ought to be, although this man consolidated the returns and forged the names of the election managers. Perhaps the reason is that this was a democratic county.

Mr. HYDE. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SMITH.]

Mr. PIKE. I would like a few minutes more.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. How much longer does the gentleman want?

Mr. PIKE. About five minutes.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. PIKE. The minority claim that the vote of Jeffersonton, in Chatham County precinct, should be disregarded because all or nearly all the votes cast there were for the contestant. Now, how was it in Bullock County? There every single vote was for the sitting member. Now, if you think that fact is evidence of fraud in the one case, why is it not just as much so in the other? Then again it is urged that the votes at these precincts cannot be counted because in one of the precincts the voting was had in the open air. Well, cannot votes be legally cast there? My idea is that if a little more daylight could get into a great many of these precincts than there is it would be all the better, and there would be vastly less fraud. When these votes were cast in the open daylight, there is objection made to it. But down in Bullock County, where the votes were hidden in dark places, kept out of sight, burned up so that you could not tell whether there were more or less, or for whom they were cast, they say that is all right. Now, I cannot understand such logic as that.

I intend to consider but few of these points. Here is the vote at Lawtonville. It is said that vote should be disregarded because the managers did not count the votes and sign the returns. Why did they not? Whose fault was it that they did not? It is stated that two of the managers went away, and when they came back they found the votes on the floor. Now, the evidence of the supervisors, Dr. Young and Judge Carswell, one of the managers and one of the clerks, is that they commenced counting out the votes, and when they had got along so far as to find that a majority was for the contestant, two of the managers withdrew and refused to have anything further to do with the count. Now, are votes to be disregarded, and a man to lose the benefit of votes cast for him, because two of the managers refused to act? Is that the rule? It is said that they were threatened. Well, sir, they ought to have been threatened, and the threats ought to have been put in force; they should have been prosecuted for a palpable violation of the law.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, as I have already said, that in no one of these precincts is there any legal objection attaching to the counting of the votes which the majority of the committee have counted, whether you take the Lawtonville precinct or any of the others.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. LAMAR. It is not my purpose to make a single remark in support of the minority report in this case. My purpose is simply to make an appeal to the gentlemen on the other side of the House to permit the sitting member to present the grounds on which he bases his claim to represent in part the State of Georgia on this floor. I know that these cases are not interesting to this House. Engrossed as the members are with employments of a more general nature, and pressed with cares in matters of public interest, it is with difficulty that they are brought to listen with attention to a case which involves complicated questions of law. But we are made "judges" of these questions, and important precedents are established by our decision. It is not a mere question of what should be the law, it is not a question of expediency, of what is desirable, or of what may promote the interest of a party or of the country. It is a question of what is right and lawful for this House to determine, as judges of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own members. "The judge" is the brief but significant language of the Constitution. We are here exercising this solemn constitutional power to-day, and it is our duty to hear all the points and weigh all the considerations that should enter into our judgment.

It will be an unprecedented act to deny to the sitting member the right, or the privilege if you choose to call it so, of giving to the House the grounds on which his claim to this seat is founded. I only ask in his behalf that he may be allowed a short time to be heard, at least to have the privilege of giving the reasons why sentence of death should not be pronounced upon him.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I second the request of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.] When I voted for the previous question, I acknowledge I was not aware of the desire of the sitting member to be heard in this case. It seems to me it would be harsh injustice if we should turn him out of the House and not allow him to be heard for one half-hour in support of his case. If that should be done, I would regret that the House had ordered the previous question.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman also desire that the other party shall have the same privilege?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Certainly; but I would give the sitting member his half-hour anyhow.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I have no objection to that, if the contestant can enjoy the same privilege.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Then I suggest that an hour be allowed—one half-hour to be given to each. I understand that the sitting member desires to have the contestant heard in this case. Let them have half an hour each. What can be fairer than that?

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I hope I shall not be understood as objecting to the request made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] and the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.] If the House sees fit to give one half-hour each to the contestant and contestee, not to be taken out of my time, I certainly shall not object.

Mr. WHITELEY. I desire to state that the Georgia delegation hope that this time will be allowed. We desire to be liberal, and we want to hear the contestant. We hope the same liberality will be extended to Mr. Rawls also; that thirty minutes will be allowed to each.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposed arrangement?

Mr. GARFIELD. Not to be farmed out to others?

The SPEAKER. The time to be exclusively occupied by those gentlemen.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. It is understood that the hour is in addition to the twenty minutes to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH] is entitled.

Mr. RAWLS. Mr. Speaker, if there is no objection I would like to go over on the other side of the House, for it is a matter of business with me now, [laughter;] and I want to speak to gentlemen on the other side. [Passing over to the republican side of the House.] I believe that it is the custom in this country, in all trials before any criminal court, to allow the accused at least the right to plead his innocence or his guilt. I fear that the charge in this case is that I am guilty of democracy. I fear that the impression upon that matter has had a good deal to do with the feeling and the findings in this case. To that I must plead guilty, but enter with the plea my protest against the criminality of the fact.

I believe that I have been legally elected a member of this House; I believe that I have been fairly elected. I have been elected by the legal voters of the State of Georgia, a State now in full harmony with the Government, with all its departments in full and ample operation. The vote was made up and sent to the office of the secretary of state, and counted and sworn to by that officer, a republican; whose testimony, in the record of this case, shows me elected by 1,340 votes. This legal majority—a majority made up by the people of Georgia, competent managers of their elections—is attempted to be overcome by the contestant by counting outside precincts that are not included in these returns, and precincts which I deny to have an existence under the laws of Georgia; precincts which, even if they do exist under a strict construction of the law, did not practically exist at that election.

Sir, I no more dreamed of an attempt to hold an election in the Chatham County precincts than I do now of flying. Not one of my political party in the city of Savannah had any idea of an attempt to hold an election in those country precincts. It was admitted by the friends of the contestant on the day preceding this election that they did not acknowledge the legal existence of these precincts. Mr. J. E. Bryant, a political friend of the contestant, waited upon the ordinary, Mr. Wetmore, on the day preceding my election, and requested him to issue an order to open these identical precincts. Mr. Wetmore swears to this fact. He refused to open them. He stated as the reason for his refusal that at an election undertaken to be held there four years preceding riot and bloodshed had ensued, one of the finest young men of the city of Savannah falling a victim. The ordinary was disgusted at that result, and refused to reopen the precincts.

Those precincts were opened in 1868 under what I hold to be a special election order, for the order refers to a special day, citing the day and the occasion, the presidential election of that day. You can find no other order upon an ordinary's book in the State of Georgia using any such specific language. The orders are broad. It is true the code of Georgia does not prescribe the language in which such orders in relation to precincts shall be framed. Their form is left with the taste or discretion of the ordinary. The ordinary swears that he used such language as conveyed that idea to the people of Chatham County for four years. He says that order was so construed for four years. Three other elections followed—one a general election in 1870, for members of Congress, members of the Legislature, and all the county officers of that county. At that election the people voted, not in those precincts, but at the court-house in the city of Savannah. In 1871 an election was held for governor, to fill the unexpired term occasioned by the resignation of Rufus B. Bullock. At that election the people of that county met at the court-house and voted, no one dreaming of holding an election at those precincts. In October, 1872, only one month preceding my election, when there was an election for governor, members of the Legislature, and all county officers, each candidate operating with all his influence upon every voter in the county, all voters who wished to vote voted inside the city. No man dreamed of voting anywhere else than at the court-house.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. RAWLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Out upon the Ogeechee road, where these Cherokee Hill fellows came from, were there not armed and mounted men who on the day of that October election prevented the negroes from coming to Savannah?

Mr. RAWLS. Is that in the testimony?

Mr. SMITH, of New York. It is in the public record, the newspapers.

Mr. RAWLS. I deny that such was the case. It is not in the testimony. I confine myself to the record. I admit that there was a riot at the election in 1868, during which, as I have stated, a young man was murdered. The ordinary swears that there was a riot; I know that such was the fact. It is in the testimony. But no such thing as the gentleman intimates appears in the testimony.

Now, sir, the order of the ordinary in 1868, under his own construction and according to the common consent and acceptance of the people of that county, was a special order. The facts show that the people did not undertake to act under it again during four years.

The majority of the committee, together with the contestant, claim that the election in 1870 was a special election, under a special law of the Legislature providing for that one election. Suppose it was. This was a law abolishing all precincts where there were no incorporated towns; and there is not one of these precincts existing where there is an incorporated town. But outside of that law, there was an order issued by the ordinary of Chatham County, in 1870, making the city of Savannah an election precinct for Chatham County, the ordinary stating in his order that the places of voting in the city would be thereafter designated. Following that up, in two or three weeks Mr. Wetmore, then the ordinary, issued another order to the people of Chatham County, a peculiar order, notifying the people outside the city, the identical people living in the district of country where these precincts are claimed to exist, that the voting would all be done at the court-house in Chatham County, and that the voters outside of the city of Savannah would vote at a certain box at the court-house in that city. That order stands to-day upon the records of the ordinary.

No effort has been made since that to abolish that order until since this election.

That latter order has been referred to by gentlemen of the majority of the committee, but there is no such order in the testimony. I want them to show it. Point that order out to us. The ordinary did not intimate in that order these precincts ever did exist, but on the contrary inserted in that order he does not admit the precincts existed; but, in order that there should not be any more trouble in the future, he makes an additional order. He does not go back on his original order, so far as he is concerned. That order is not in the testimony, but it has been referred to by the majority of the committee.

Now in reference to these Chatham County precincts. I know the people of Chatham County well. I know there is intelligence there. I know there are gentlemen there able to decide all these questions. I know gentlemen there who, although they may have been rebels, have intelligence, and they have honesty when called upon to decide a legal question, to make that decision in accordance with the laws and with the facts.

The managers of the court-house election were all white and intelligent citizens, and the majority of them officers of the county. They refused to receive these returns; but fearing they might be mistaken, although they were satisfied in their own convictions, they called upon some of the ablest lawyers in the city of Savannah and submitted the question to them. There was not a dissenting voice among all these lawyers as to the illegality of these precincts. But, in addition to that, I have consulted an able gentleman, a gentleman of position, to whom I am in hopes this House will give credit for honesty and for ability to judge a question of this kind. I ask that the Clerk will read his letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, March 2, 1874.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 28th ultimo is received. You request me to state "the number of places for voting and where they are situated in the city of Savannah, and county of Chatham, that had been recognized and used as voting places in the several elections during several years preceding the election held on the 5th day of November, 1872."

From 1852, when I became a resident of Savannah, to 1862, there was but one voting place in Chatham, and that was at the court-house in Savannah. On reflection I have not been able to remember a single election held during those ten years at which a precinct was used, or established, in that county.

The first time that precincts were established (except during the war, when they were opened in certain localities to enable soldiers to vote) was in 1868, at the election for President. These precincts were then established at Ogeechee, Cherokee Hill, and the Isle of Hope.

My recollection is that at no election held after the one for President in 1868, down to the election in November, 1872, was there a vote polled in Chatham County outside of the city of Savannah.

I was present and voted at the court-house in Savannah at the election for Representatives to Congress and other officers in November, 1872, and I did not suppose that votes would be cast in the county of Chatham on that day at any other poll, but late in the day I heard that the colored people were voting in the country. I did not doubt then, as I do not doubt now, that there was no law in Georgia for opening those precincts at that election.

Yours, very truly,

T. M. NORWOOD.

Hon. MORGAN RAWLS.

Mr. RAWLS. Now, Mr. Speaker, the contestant and the majority of the committee seem to put a good deal of stress upon the appointment of supervisors for these precincts. I had no knowledge of the appointment of supervisors, nor had my party any knowledge of the appointment of supervisors. How were they appointed, where, and by whom? The record says they were appointed on the 1st of November, when the election took place on the 5th. They were appointed in the circuit court. Not one man in a thousand in Georgia is in the circuit court, even at the regular sittings; and I do not believe this contestant, or the circuit court judge himself, can name a single democrat who was in the circuit court when these appointments were made. I did not know such offices existed until after the election. I heard of no notoriety given to them. Even if they were appointed, and publicity given to the appointment, that does not constitute the creation of a legal voting place. The law of Georgia requires the ordinary to establish precincts, and the appointment of a circuit judge cannot create a precinct. You might as well claim that the appointment of supervisors for every cross-road in the State of Georgia would make them legal voting places, as to insist that the appointment of these supervisors made these precincts legal.

Suppose we had notice, who are these supervisors? Suppose the precincts existed; who are they? Are they any better men than the majority of the gentlemen of Georgia; are they better than the ordinary class of people there because they hold Federal appointments? I did not know a Federal appointment made a regeneration in mankind. If it does, we had better suspend action on this case and pass a resolution requiring the appointment of all men as supervisors.

Who is the chief supervisor? Amherst W. Stone. Who is he? Where did he come from? He is a man, I understand, who existed in Georgia for a brief period of two or three years preceding the revolution. The war came on, and he had too much loyalty to stay in that rebel State. He left the State. I ask your honorable chairman of the Military Committee to show me his name upon the muster-roll of the United States Army. I will bet his name is not there. As soon as the smoke of battle was over this man reappeared in the State of Georgia. When the distribution of offices took place he came back, and was on hand for his share.

He had recently been appointed, as well as I can recollect, assistant district attorney, the position occupied by the contestant a short time prior to his nomination for Congress in that district. This man Stone so manipulated the election by the appointment of men, all of his own political party throughout the entire district, except that where he was mistaken in a man he may have appointed a few democrats. But in these Chatham precincts the returns show that in two of the districts I did not get a solitary vote.

Where is the democracy, then, in the supervisors? In one precinct they claim that the democratic supervisor did not attend. The other did attend, and his name is signed to the certificate certifying that the election was fairly and honorably held, and not a democratic vote was received for me.

A MEMBER. Not the supervisor's own?

Mr. RAWLS. Not even his own. If that is democracy, that is not the way I look at it.

Now, sir, not being satisfied with these appointments, this supervisor sends to the Clerk of this House a document that was not brought to me, that was not presented by the contestant in taking his testimony, and that I never saw until I found it printed and marked "Additional papers in the contested case of Sloan vs. Rawls," and distributed with the other documents.

He concludes his report as follows:

In submitting this report, I beg leave to say that I have endeavored to make it correct and impartial, and to the best of my knowledge it is so.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

AMHERST W. STONE,
Chief Supervisor of Election for the Southern Judicial District of Georgia.

I will prove by a certificate from him, copied from the certificates made to him by the sub-supervisors, that this does not contain the full report from that district.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. RAWLS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I would ask the gentleman whether the voters who cast their votes on this election day at Chatham precinct were or were not legal voters under the laws of the State of Georgia; and whether their votes if cast anywhere else at the proper precinct would have been objected to by the contestee? I ask this question because I find the sitting member an affable and courteous gentleman; and if any charges of this character were made by him they would have weight on the vote I am about to cast.

Mr. RAWLS. I did not have the time to investigate these precincts. The contestant took his testimony for forty days and attacked the best returns I had in my district. I had to repel his attack. And I thought that if there was anything that had to go uninvestigated, it should be the returns not counted by the managers of that election. I gave my time to the attack made upon the legal returns. My time expired before I could reach these precincts. But if the House will permit me to go there, I will show frauds sufficient to throw them out, even if the precincts exist by law.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. The gentleman will find the name of every voter in these outside precincts in the testimony.

Mr. RAWLS. Yes, sir; and I can show that half of them had not paid taxes, and probably are not citizens of that county.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. They are recorded whether they pay taxes or not.

Mr. RAWLS. The testimony shows this, that at the October election one A. N. Wilson, collector of revenue, went to the court-house with a list of names and several hundred dollars, which he tendered to the tax-collector, requesting the tax-collector to furnish him voting receipts for every dollar he tendered him. The tax-collector swears that not over one-half the names given him on that list were on his tax-books. Now, when these gentlemen went with $1,385, which is the amount sworn to as given to the collector, and undertook to obtain the right to cast 1,385 votes for $1,385 for the poor ignorant colored voters, who had no more desire to vote for them than for me, they resorted to these precincts to get in the names which they tried to vote at the October election.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in regard to this garbled extract, which I charge has been made here by the chief supervisor, Amherst W. Stone, I ask the Clerk to read the exhibit marked V.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXHIBIT V.

SYLVANIA, SCRIVEN COUNTY, GEORGIA,
November 8, 1872.

SIR: I herewith inclose a copy of commission. The other supervisor did not serve, because his papers were for the thirty-sixth district and he would not subscribe to the oath.

We had some difficulty in getting managers, the United States deputy marshal having been here the day before (as he said) after the managers of the October election, and from threats of the radical party they were afraid to serve.

Everything went off quiet. I never saw a more quiet election. I was present through the whole day, and saw every vote polled and counted. I was present at the consolidation. There was one district thrown out because the managers did not subscribe to the oath of office. It is nearly all democratic.

Yours, respectfully,

A. H. MATHEWS, M. D.

Mr. A. W. STONE.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the report of A. H. Mathews, one of the supervisors of election at Sylvania, Scriven County, Georgia, at the time stated in said report.

In witness whereof, I hereto set my hand—having no seal of office—this December 30, 1873.

AMHERST W. STONE,
Late Supervisor of Election, Southern District of Georgia.

CAMERON, November 8, 1872.

Mr. A. W. STONE:

I send you below the result of our election in this, the two hundred and fifty-ninth district, Scriven County, Georgia, on the 5th instant, for presidential electors for Greeley:

Each elector	36
Morgan Rawls, for Congress	31
Andrew Sloan	4
Charles O'Conor, for President	6

J. W EVANS.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the report of J. W. Evans, one of the supervisors of the election at Cameron, Scriven County, Georgia, at the time stated in said report.

In witness whereof I hereto set my hand—having no seal of office—this December 30, 1873.

AMHERST W. STONE,
Late Supervisor for Southern District of Georgia.

Mr. RAWLS. Now, sir, there is one precinct that gave me 31 votes and the contestant 4. Take this report, made by the supervisor, examine it carefully, and see if you will find that precinct returned. It is not there. That is one of the certificates made to the chief supervisor, whose duty, if he made any returns, was to return everything connected with the election.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. That vote has been allowed by the majority of the committee.

Mr. RAWLS. I know it has been allowed, but I am speaking of the conduct of this impartial gentleman. I charge that the appointment of these supervisors was a fraud upon me, intended to pack these election precincts with men of his own political party. I was not represented at any precinct in Chatham County.

I turn now to the Jeffersonton precinct, in Camden County. I am willing to risk my entire election upon that precinct. The contestant comes here with a vote of 205 for Jeffersonton precinct, while I did not receive one vote there. The gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HYDE,] who opened this discussion on behalf of the majority of the committee, stated that any court of justice in Georgia would sustain many of their points. Sir, if the Jeffersonton precinct be submitted to the supreme court of my State, or to the Supreme Court of the United States, and they decide that that precinct exists according to law, I will take my hat and walk out of this House without a murmur. I do not pretend to be a lawyer, but a gentleman who undertakes to assert here that that was a legal precinct could not make his living in my State by practicing law. [Laughter.] In 1868 the ordinary of that county, Mr. McWhorter, issued an order abolishing Jeffersonton as a precinct. In 1870 the Legislature of Georgia passed a law allowing the voters of Camden County to vote upon the question of the removal of the court-house. Shepherd, the only manager of the Camden election who was put upon the stand by the contestant, swears that upon the day of the election the court-house of Camden County was at Saint Mary's. This seems to be a double-headed monster with the majority of the committee. They claim that Jeffersonton was a precinct under an old statute of 1821, a statute which has grown obsolete years ago, and which has been wiped out, not only by the code of Georgia, but by the constitution of the State. I ask the Clerk to read one of the subdivisions of the constitution of the State of Georgia.

Mr. RAWLS. I would like to have that read.

The SPEAKER. It will be read if there be no objection.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

ARTICLE III.

SECTION 6. The General Assembly shall have no power to grant corporate powers and privileges to private companies, except to banking, insurance, railroad, canal, navigation, mining, express, lumber, manufacturing, and telegraph companies; nor to make or change election precincts; nor to establish bridges or ferries; nor to change names of legitimate children; but it shall prescribe by law the manner in which such power shall be exercised by the courts.

Mr. PELHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia may have five minutes to conclude his remarks.

No objection was made.

Mr. RAWLS. Now, that has been the constitution ever since 1860. According to the position taken by the majority of the committee, that under the statute of 1821 this precinct of Jeffersonton still exists, and that the ordinary of Camden County did not abolish it, because the court-house was there, I would like to know upon what ground they claim the existence of the precinct after the court-house was removed.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. The gentleman has not stated the position of the majority of the committee correctly. They put themselves on the ground that under the constitution the Legislature could not abolish the precinct.

Mr. SPEER. I object to the gentleman from New York interrupting the gentleman from Georgia; he will have twenty minutes after the gentleman from Georgia concludes.

Mr. RAWLS. Then I understand the position of the majority of the committee to be this, that the people of Georgia have no right to legislate or act for themselves in reference to election precincts. If they cannot by an order from the ordinary change or abolish a precinct, will the gentleman tell me by what authority they could change or abolish the precinct? He certainly does not mean to say that they had no right to change or abolish the precinct. I have more regard for his legal ability than to suppose that. I know that in Georgia there is no question about it, and I am willing, as I remarked before, to risk my entire election upon that one precinct. But I am elected if you count every vote, regular or irregular, that was returned to the secretary of state by any manager of the election, as shown by the statement of N. C. Barnett, secretary of state, placed in the testimony.

Yet strange to say, the majority of the committee, with all its pretended magnanimity, seeing that statement there in the same testimony, made no reference to it, but referred to a statement made by Mr. Cotting about the time he went out of office, giving everything that N. C. Barnett gives with the exception of the Scriven County precinct, which he states gave me 31 votes that he did not put in the report. The statement given by Mr. Cotting elects the contestant by 12 votes. Mr. Barnett's statement elects me.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know that what I have said, or that what any of my friends have said, is going to do me any good in this case.

I am afraid that much has been said here that I could not hear, that much influence has been brought to bear upon members that I could not reach. I have no influence with this side of the House; I have sought none outside of as polite and personal conversation as I could make to request some of them to look into my case, and give me what I am entitled to. When it comes to voting on this question, I know it will be a difficult matter to get republicans to vote for a democrat. I think that for my safety my friends had better be content with a rising vote, for upon this question the republicans will be stronger in their knees than in their stomachs. If it comes to pulling a democratic vote out of a republican by the yeas and nays, I think it would take a corkscrew to draw it out.

Mr. SLOAN, (the contestant.) The honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. RAWLS,] in the beginning of his remarks, said that he would come over to this side of the House. He took it for granted, I presume, that his own side of the House was committed to him, and he would address his remarks to this side alone. I shall endeavor to address mine to the entire House, for their consideration and examination.

In the first place, the great element of disturbance in this case, to those who have any doubt upon it, seems to be the three country precincts in the county of Chatham. I will endeavor to explain the history of those precincts, when they were established, for what purpose they were established, how long they existed, when they were abolished, and how they were abolished.

It is said that the election held in those precincts in 1872 was a secret and quiet election; that the sitting member here knew nothing about it, nor did his friends know anything about it. Now I would like to ask members of this House how an election could have been a secret and quiet election when there were 1,241 persons who voted there? In addition to that, the history of these precinct elections was this: Twelve or fifteen days before the election in 1872 I applied to the ordinary of the county of Chatham to ascertain if the three precincts known as Cherokee Hill, Chapman's house, and Isle of Hope, had been abolished by an order from his court. He replied that he had issued an order abolishing them. We examined his record, as he was required by law to put the order upon the minutes of his court, and found that no such order had been passed. We then examined the papers on file in his court; and no such order or paper could be found on his files. I then told him that we would hold elections at those precincts at the coming election; that there were over 10,000 voters in the county of Chatham, and that by no possibility could they all cast their votes at one election precinct in the city of Savannah, with the election lasting but one day.

In addition to that I got certified copies of those orders. The judge of the district court of the United States was then in the city of Savannah for the purpose of appointing supervisors under what is known as the enforcement law of the United States. Before any action was taken in the matter I got certified copies of all papers and carried them to the judge, and asked him if, with these orders before him, he was willing to appoint supervisors for these precincts as legal existing precincts. He said that he had no doubt whatever in the case, and he appointed supervisors on the 1st day of November, four days before the election. Yet with the appointment of these supervisors made public in the public prints, being made matters of record on the records of the United States court, it is charged that the election in these three precincts was a quiet and secret election, gotten up by myself and friends for my own political purpose and object. In point of fact that is entirely untrue.

I say that, so far as the charge made in regard to these election precincts being used at that time in a quiet and stealthy manner, it is not supported by anything in the record. The name of every voter at those precincts was furnished to the sitting member by myself. Everything was made up and submitted to the officers of election in Savannah on the night of the election. There were 1,241 people who voted there. Yet they make the charge of stealth against those precincts.

The question may be asked, why did not the sitting member receive votes at those places? The democratic supervisor at the Isle of Hope precinct did not act, but went to the city of Savannah; the republican supervisor did act, and voted. The democratic supervisor at Chapman's house, where Mr. Rawls received 2 votes, did vote and act, and certified to the correctness of the returns; and the name of that democratic supervisor is upon the list. At Cherokee Hill the democratic supervisor certified to the correctness of the proceedings and the legality of the vote. The republican supervisor voted, but the democratic supervisor did not vote. I say therefore that, so far as the charge of stealth is concerned, it is not true in point of fact and is not sustained by anything in the testimony.

Then the question which has been raised by gentlemen who have argued this case on the opposite side, recurs, why was it that these election precincts were not used in the interim from 1868 to 1872? The answer to that question is simple. The only election for members of Congress that was held from 1868 to 1872 was the election held in 1870, which was held under a special election law of the State of Georgia, passed after the State was authorized to be readmitted into the Union under the reconstruction acts. That act of 1870 provided that elections should be held in incorporated towns and cities. It was a special act for that election. It provided for devoting three days to the election; and we had established in the city of Savannah then a separate and distinct voting place from the court-house. The election lasted for three days at those two voting places in the city of Savannah. That is the reason why those precincts were not used in 1870. There was no necessity for their use. Provision was made by a special statute for the election being held during three days in the city of Savannah.

But the ordinary of Chatham County did in 1872, a month after the election in November, have an order entered on the records of his court abolishing these precincts. What use or necessity was there for the ordinary making such an order in December, 1872, if the precincts had been abolished previous to that time? When he failed to find these orders upon the minutes of the court, when he failed to find them among the records on file, he told me that he had abolished the precincts or had intended to do so. As the court was to meet on Monday preceding the election which was held on Tuesday, I then asked him whether he would abolish those precincts. He promised me that he would take no further steps in the matter, that he would not abolish them at that time, and he did not then abolish them; they existed until December, 1872, one month thereafter. That is the whole history of these precinct returns.

Let me now illustrate the difficulties under which we labored in regard to this election. Those difficulties were all on our side. In January, 1873, we elected, by co-operation of members of the republican party with an independent element of the democratic party, an ordinary for Chatham County pledged to open precincts in each of the eight militia districts of that county. The Legislature of Georgia, meeting immediately thereafter, passed an act excepting that ordinary from the provisions of the general law of the State, and requiring that before he could establish election precincts he should get the consent or recommendation of two concurrent grand juries.

In addition to that, about three days later, the Legislature passed an act establishing for the county of Chatham a board of county commissioners, to be appointed by the governor, thus taking all power from the ordinary of that county. So that by no possibility could we have election precincts unless established by these men, and with the recommendation of two successive grand juries. We made application subsequently for the establishment of election precincts in that county, and we were told we could not have them without the recommendation of two grand juries. And since the order of 1872 we stand in the county of Chatham in this position: with 10,312 voters, we have but one voting precinct, but one place at which to cast our ballots, and that place managed and controlled entirely by the other party.

There is no question in the minds of the people of the first district of Georgia in regard to the action of the House as to these 1,239 votes. There is no charge of illegality in regard to the voters themselves; no fraud is alleged. I furnished a full list of names to the sitting member, and he has not proven that a single one of the votes cast in those precincts was illegal.

But the sitting member must not come before this House with an air of injured innocence and say that frauds were perpetrated on our side, when we had no opportunity to perpetrate them, when nearly every voting place throughout the length and breadth of the entire district was managed and controlled by his own party friends. On the other hand, the record shows on behalf of the sitting member such a state of fraud as would be sufficient, when perpetrated between man and man, to bring the blush of shame to a demon's cheek. If the record of these frauds were read here it would strike the House with horror. In the county of Burke there are, by the census of 1870, 3,900 voters, of whom my opponent's party has about 900. I have evidence of the highest authority showing that no more than half of these 900 voted; the evidence to which I refer is his own speech, made before the Election Committee. But although he had only 900 voters all told, and although not more than half of those voted, the election managers of that county returned for him 1,051 votes, more than he had voters upon a full vote of the county; while they returned for myself something more than 1,000. Under the laws of Georgia the papers of an election are required to be kept for sixty days, and then only the ballots, and no other papers, can be destroyed. I served notice on the clerk of the superior court to preserve the papers, yet he burned and destroyed every vestige of the election in that county, so that when we came to make an investigation no records could be found. Thus, in a county of that kind, with the political majority on our side, most atrocious frauds were perpetrated, and were then sought to be covered up by casting the papers to the flames, so that we could not get at them. In one precinct, where 35 votes were returned for me and 105 for the sitting member, I produced sixty witnesses who swore that they cast their votes for me at that precinct. That, I apprehend, is a sample of the election held in that county.

There is another county, the county of Bullock, which figured conspicuously in this election. The election was held there on the 5th of November. They had two mails from that county, one on each Thursday, before the time the governor declared the result of the election. Although this consolidated return was signed up on the very day the election took place, that is on the 5th of November, 1872, yet the testimony of the witnesses in the case (and every manager of the election there was a friend of the sitting member) shows that some of the returns did not reach the court-house until the day subsequent to the election. Although they did not reach the court-house until the day subsequent to the election, nevertheless they bear date the same day the election took place, that is, on the 5th of November.

On the 12th of November, 1872, we find by the testimony in the record that all the election papers and returns pertaining to this election held in this county were down in the city of Savannah, in the hands of irresponsible parties, who had no connection with that election, and were then again sent off to the county of Bullock. We find on the morning after these returns were in the city of Savannah the leading democratic paper in that city came out with a statement (giving it as an official statement) of the result of the election held in that county, that 420 majority was given for Mr. Rawls, when previous to that time his majority had only been estimated at about 400. That was published as the official vote the very day after the return first reached Savannah. They were then sent back to the county of Bullock.

On the 19th of November, 1872, these papers were again found in the city of Savannah, and from there mailed to Atlanta. They were then fifty miles farther off from the capital than the place where they started from. When they reached Atlanta, instead of 420 being the majority for Mr. Rawls, as was stated in the democratic paper of Savannah as the official vote, the majority of the sitting member was increased to 568. They were the last returns sent in, held back, I suppose, in order to make up the amount necessary to give the sitting member his certificate. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Elections, in their liberality to the sitting member, allowed all these votes to be counted to their full extent against me. They gave him the benefit of every one of those 568 votes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in this case but this one fact, and that is that I received a majority of the votes cast. When the result of the election was determined by the governor, and the certificate given to the sitting member, he had in the secretary of state's office a majority of 65 votes. But there was an outstanding precinct in the county of Camden where it is admitted by both sides, both by the minority as well as by the majority of the Committee on Elections, I had a majority of 77 votes. That vote itself, which was sent in a few days afterward, gave me a majority of 12 over the sitting member. But there was a precinct in another county, namely, Burke, where I had a majority of 76 votes, the returns of which came in afterward. That still further increased my majority over the sitting member. From that majority there was only to be deducted one precinct in Scriven County, where he received, according to the returns, 31 votes, and I received 4, giving him a majority of 27 votes.

Now, sir, giving him the benefit of every vote proved, upon every return made; giving him all that he can by any possibility claim, he is still behind, upon these papers, upon all the proof in the case, and upon the record made up here, to the extent of 59 votes.

There is another thing I would like to say, and that is this: In the county of Chatham we could only have two supervisors under the enforcement act. We were entitled under the laws of Georgia to only one precinct in every militia district, the State having been divided into militia districts. In the election of 1872, in the city of Savannah—whether to violate or evade the law in regard to supervisors or not is more than I can say—four precincts were established in the court-house, when under the law they could have but two supervisors. Instead of the three managers allowed under the law of Georgia, they had twelve managers and two supernumeraries. I say that was a violation of the law. They counted out 22 votes more than the poll-lists show were cast. The record is here. When the gentleman refers to fraud let me ask him to go into his own camp and to search the acts and records of his own friends. He will find tenfold more fraud perpetrated by them than is charged by the honorable gentleman against our side. We had no opportunity to perpetrate it even if we had desired to do so. But I will not trouble the House longer with remarks upon this matter. I neither intended nor expected to speak here. One thing is sure: whether you consider this case upon its merits or upon technicalities, the result is the same, and that, too, in my favor. I leave it for your consideration and determination.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. G. F. HOAR in the chair.) The present occupant of the chair understood the House to grant half an hour to the contestee and half an hour to the contestant, but the Chair is not informed in regard to the length of time remaining to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SMITH.]

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. It has already been stated that there were twenty-five minutes remaining.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the gentleman from New York is entitled to twenty-five minutes.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I yield fifteen minutes of my time to my colleague from New York, [Mr. WOODFORD.]

Mr. WOODFORD. Mr. Speaker, in this contested-election case of Sloan vs. Rawls, from the first congressional district of Georgia, the printed testimony and documentary evidence are very voluminous, consisting of about four hundred and fifteen pages. We also have before us the briefs and reports, making about sixty-nine additional pages. And yet the actual points of controversy are but few.

Both the majority and minority reports take for their starting-point the official vote by counties as returned to the secretary of state before the certificate of election was issued. This was given on November 26, 1872, to Mr. Rawls, the sitting member. The vote was as follows:

	Sloan.	Rawls.
Official vote	6,979	8,319
Both reports allowed the vote of Bailey's Mills precinct, in Camden County, as follows	94	17
Both allowed to Mr. Sloan an error in returning the vote of Burke County	38	....
Both admit the vote of the two hundred and fifty-ninth district, Scriven County	4	31
Thus the vote at this point of our inquiry is	7,115	8,367

Here begins the difference of judgment in the committee.

The minority seek to deduct the vote of Scotland precinct, Emanuel County, being 19 for Mr. Sloan and 10 for Mr. Rawls. The managers allowed these votes in their consolidated official returns. There certainly were informalities; but they were of the same general character as those in the two hundred and fifty-ninth district, Scriven County, where 4 votes were cast for Mr. Sloan and 31 for Mr. Rawls. These votes, although not admitted by the managers in the consolidated official returns, are still allowed by the entire committee in the two reports before us.

It is an established rule of law that, in seeking to ascertain the result of a popular election, technicalities shall be disregarded and the actual facts be sought. The point of inquiry is, for whom did the legal voters actually cast their ballots? The object of the inquiry is to give practical and efficient expression to the will of the people as shown by their votes.

The resulting rule of law is logically and necessarily this: seek and accept the substance and reject the technicality. It would be unfair to follow this rule in the district of Scriven County for the benefit of Mr. Rawls, and deny it in Emanuel County to the prejudice of Mr. Sloan. The majority report is equally fair to both, and allows to each all the votes cast for each in the two precincts.

The minority report seeks to throw out the vote of Jefferson precinct, Camden County, being 205 for Mr. Sloan. This vote was allowed by the local managers in their consolidated official return.

There may be reasonable doubt as to whether the precinct had not been abolished. But the votes were cast at a polling place long established by law and well known to all the people. The election was conducted by the regular officials. Federal supervisors, one democrat and one republican, had been duly appointed and attended. There is no question but that all the votes were actually and fairly cast and honestly counted. As our purpose is to get at the facts, we should do what the managers did in making up their consolidated return, and allow the vote.

Mr. RAWLS. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. WOODFORD. Certainly.

Mr. RAWLS. If I understand the gentleman correctly, he speaks of Jefferson as an old and recognized election precinct. Now the testimony shows that at the election held one month before the county board of managers rejected the return from that precinct, and gave notice to the people of the county that it was not a legal precinct.

Mr. WOODFORD. I said there might be doubt as to the legality of that precinct; but there was no moral doubt as to the votes cast thereat.

If the positive letter of the law is to be strictly applied to this precinct, then with equal fairness we must apply the like strict letter and severe judgment to the entire consolidated return from Bullock County.

At Jefferson, Camden County, no democratic votes are returned, but the result is given as 205 for Mr. Sloan.

In all Bullock County, with its half-dozen precincts, no republican votes were returned, but the result is given as 568 for Mr. Rawls.

No candid man, after careful examination, can reasonably deny that votes were actually cast at Jefferson; that the place had long been a voting precinct; that the regular officers, State and Federal, conducted and supervised the election; and that the vote as returned to the county managers, and allowed and consolidated by them, was and is substantially the vote as actually cast.

Nor do I see how candid men, after like careful study, can reasonably deny that votes were actually cast at the several precincts of Bullock County; that the elections at these precincts were carelessly conducted; that the requirements of the statutes of Georgia in respect to the consolidation of precinct returns by the managers of this county were grossly violated; that this violation was either from singular ignorance or willful fraud; that the signatures to the consolidated return are mostly forgeries; and that the principal actor in this proceeding, a proceeding which if not a muddle of ignorance was a scheme of fraud, when put under oath deliberately declined to answer probing questions upon the express ground that his answers might tend to criminate himself. Still the weight of evidence clearly shows that Mr. Rawls did in fact receive all or nearly all the votes cast in this entire county. Let us go to the verge of intelligent faith, even to that of trustful credulity, and allow to Mr. Rawls the entire vote. But while doing this let us not, in the strict letter of the bond, exact the "pound of flesh" when we sit in judgment on the vote of Jefferson for Mr. Sloan. Mr. Rawls receives thereby an allowance of 568 votes, while Mr. Sloan gets but 205. The voters at Jefferson were poor and unlettered freedmen. Their only ignorance was of the abolition of a long-established precinct at the court-house of their county.

The voters of all Bullock County were unanimously conservative, and we gladly concede that they were presumably as cultured as they were honest, and as honest as they were cultured. Their only ignorance was of the clear requirement of the statute law and of the somewhat ugly fact, there unknown although elsewhere well established, that to place upon a public document the counterfeited signatures of absent officials sometimes bears the disagreeable name of possible forgery.

Substantial justice will probably be done if we admit all these returns. Let us fondly hope that when more school-houses shall have been established among the blacks, and more toleration among the whites, the colored people of Camden County will learn where to vote, and the whites of Bullock how to consolidate their precinct returns without the commission of forgery.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it not true that the precedents all show that where an election is held at an improper place the vote cannot be counted; and is it not further true that where there is any error as to the return or consolidation of the votes you can go behind it and ascertain what the vote was?

Mr. WOODFORD. My friend will bear in mind that I have but fifteen minutes. I have endeavored to examine this matter in the light of election laws. It is useless for me to go into a detailed answer to the question which my friend suggests; but I will frankly say that, after having carefully studied the returns of this election, I find that the precedents all run in this line: "Exclude the poor freedmen from the ballot-box if you can, and count the white conservative in if you can."

The majority report recommends that we allow and count the vote of Lawtonville, in Burke County, which was not consolidated by the local managers, with the official returns from that county. This vote was 189 for Mr. Sloan and 113 for Mr. Rawls. Lawtonville is admitted by both sides to have been a legally established precinct. The managers and election clerk were all democrats.

The United States supervisors of elections were present. The people attended and voted. When the time for counting arrived two of the managers withdrew. One remained, and, with the clerk and one of the supervisors, counted the votes. To admit that two of the three election officers could, by their voluntary withdrawal, vitiate the ballot and throw out the vote, is simply to put in the hands of the majority of every election board the power to frustrate the will of the voters at that local district. The claim is simply monstrous. Its bare statement involves its absolute rejection. The House will beyond question indorse the committee in allowing the vote of this precinct.

Admitting this vote and adding it to the respective results, as already stated, we have—

	Sloan.	Rawls.
Official returns	7,115	8,367
Add vote of Lawtonville	189	113

We now come to the last and the most important matter of difference in these reports. The majority of the committee admit the vote of the three country precincts of Chatham County which were rejected by the local managers of the election. The majority sustain the decision of the local board.

These precincts gave Mr. Sloan 1,239 votes, and Mr. Rawls but 2. If these 1,239 be added to the 6,304 which, as I have already endeavored to show, the majority report justly allows to Mr. Sloan in the rest of this congressional district, his total admitted vote will be 8,543. Adding to the 8,480 votes for Mr. Rawls the 2 cast for him in these country precincts, his total admitted vote will be 8,482. This will give Mr. Sloan an admitted majority of 61.

Let me speak as briefly with regard to the vote of Chatham County as the gravity of the matter will permit. This question reaches far beyond the personal interests of these contestants. Its just solution may involve the right of the colored men of Georgia to the ballot for many years to come.

I understand that before the rebellion the law of Georgia permitted eight voting precincts in the county of Chatham, being one in each of the eight militia districts into which that county was divided. Four of these districts were in the city of Savannah. These were identical with the four city wards. The remaining four comprised the country districts of the county. In fact, however, no voting precincts had been established in the country districts by the inferior court which had authority therefor, and until after the close of the rebellion all the citizens of Chatham County voted in the city of Savannah. This county is about twenty miles in length. Some parts of it are nearly fifteen miles from the county court-house, which is in the city of Savannah. The white population of this county mostly, if not entirely, reside in the city. When the colored people had no vote the failure to establish voting precincts in the several country militia districts inflicted no practical hardship upon any considerable part of the voting population.

At the election held in 1865, to prepare for the reconstruction which President Johnson attempted to secure by his executive orders, the polls for Chatham County were only opened in the city of Savannah. But no colored man voted then, and, for the reason already stated, no serious, practical injustice was done to the whites.

I believe that no general election was held in Georgia in 1866.

In 1868 there was one for the purpose of ratifying the proposed State constitution and choosing a governor, State officers, and members of the Legislature.

This election lasted for four days, and was conducted under the regulations prescribed in a military order by General George G. Meade, then commanding that military department. This election, so far as Chatham County was concerned, was only held in the city of Savannah; but the length of time (four days) during which voting was allowed permitted the citizens, white and black, to come from all parts of the county, and gave them sufficient time to deposit their ballots without hinderance or molestation. Later, and in November of the same year, the presidential election was held. If I am correctly informed, one ballot-box was used for the four city districts, and this was placed at the court-house in the city of Savannah. But by authority of the judicial officer, who is known as the ordinary of Chatham County, election precincts were also established at Cherokee Hill, in the eighth militia district, embracing the whole of that district; at Chapman's house, in the seventh militia district, embracing the whole of that district; and on the Isle of Hope, embracing the whole of the fifth and sixth militia districts. This order was made under the authority given to the justice by section 1312 of Irwin's Revised Code of Georgia.

On October 3, 1870, the Legislature of Georgia passed an act providing for a special election in that State, to continue for three days, beginning on the 20th of December, 1870, and ending on the 22d of that month. Members of Congress to serve during the unexpired term of the Forty-first Congress, and also certain State and local officials, were to be elected.

That special act provided in its third section that said election should be held at the several court-houses at the county seats and at any election precinct, existing or that might be established in any incorporated and organized city or town. It was a special law. It provided for a special "three days' election." It resulted from the action of the Federal Congress, which had restored the colored members to those seats in the State Legislature from which they had been forcibly expelled by their conservative associates. It lasted, as I have said, for three days, and thus, like the election ordered by General Meade, afforded ample facilities for the colored people to come in from the country precincts to the court-houses and the cities and vote in safety. Its provisions were definitely intended and by inevitable inference absolutely confined to the one "special three days'" election of 1870.

Two ballot-boxes were at that time used at the court-house in Savannah. Voters residing within the city limits voted in the box at the President-street entrance, on the north side of the building; and voters residing in Chatham County, outside the city limits, voted at the box on the York-street entrance, on the south side.

I have just been informed that a special election was held in 1871 to fill the vacancy in the governorship caused by the resignation of Governor Bullock. I am not conversant with the special facts of that election.

The next regular general election was held in October of 1872, and was for governor, State officers, and members of the Legislature.

At that election no Federal supervisors were authorized to act. No practical protection was afforded to the colored voters. The country precincts were not opened. The republicans did not participate to any extent. Four boxes were used at the court-house in Savannah. Less than 4,000 ballots were cast in all those four boxes, although the number of legal voters in Chatham County is between 9,000 and 10,000. In a single word, the educated conservatism of the city of Savannah did substantially what the ignorant radicalism of New Orleans is accused of having attempted later in that same autumn. By ingenuity of legal device, by practical injustice on the part of the judical officer who had the authority to establish additional voting precincts, and by a general course of conduct which seems an outrage against the rights of free citizenship, the poor and lowly classes of Chatham County were kept from the polls and practically denied the right of suffrage.

The presidential and congressional election occurred in the following month of November, 1872. The old decree or order of the judge of the court of ordinary, made in 1868, and establishing there country precincts, had never been formally changed or abolished by any like decree of a competent court.

On November 1, 1872, Judge Erskine, of the United States district court for the southern district of Georgia, under the authority of United States law, appointed supervisors of election, consisting of one republican and one democrat for each of the three precincts in the county of Chatham outside of Savannah. All of these supervisors acted except the one democrat appointed for the precinct at the Isle of Hope. He was fittingly absent. For when the decree of a fearless judge had assured the ballot of the lowly, the Isle of Hope was to our conservative obstructionists a land of disappointment. These supervisors certified to the fairness of the election at their respective precincts and to the honesty of the count. The returns were rejected by the managers of the county, but were subsequently sent to the office of the secretary of state of Georgia, and, according to his certificate of January 9, 1873, were duly filed therein.

The question as to allowing and counting these ballots is twofold. First, let me examine the strict construction of the statute, and then address a few words to the conscience of this House as to the equity of the case.

Under the admitted authority given by section 1312, Irwin's Revised Code of Georgia, the justice of the inferior court had an absolute right to establish election precincts, not exceeding one in each militia district. There were and are four militia districts in the country portion of Chatham County.

On October 22, 1868, Judge Wetmore, the ordinary of Chatham County, established the three precincts at Cherokee Hill, Chapman's house, and the Isle of Hope. These precincts had legal inception and creation. The election of 1870 was a special election, under a special law. It lasted for three days, and for the purpose of that election, and for that alone, allowed but one voting precinct at each county court-house and in each incorporated city or town.

If it was a general law, and abolished all right to have and enjoy voting precincts in the several militia districts of the several respective counties at all future elections, it might with as good reason be claimed that it opened the polls for three days at each and every general election thereafter to be held in the State of Georgia. That all subsequent elections have been held but for one day each is in itself conclusive argument that the law of October 7, 1870, providing for the election of December, 1870, was special; that it was for a given purpose, and is to be confined in its construction, as it was confined in its practical enforcement, to the single election of December, 1870.

The law of 1870 did not therefore abolish the precincts established in 1868. These survived for all subsequent elections until they were legally abolished in December, 1872, by a formal order then made by the same judge who had originally created them. Why did he then, after the election in question, abolish them if he did not believe or fear that up to that time they had legal existence?

The highest privilege of a citizen is that of the free but honest use of the ballot. The highest duty of the citizen in time of peace is to cast that ballot, to vote for such candidates and in aid of such policy as he conscientiously believes for the good of his country.

All laws relating to the exercise of this right and the discharge of this duty should be so construed and so enforced as to secure to each duly authorized citizen the right to vote for the candidate of his choice, without hinderance, molestation, or oppression.

The ballot-box is the ultimate source of all political power under our system. Standing before that ballot-box there is to-day no just and lawful difference between man and man, arising from race, color, or previous condition of servitude. The highest and the lowest, the richest, the poorest, the black and the white, meet there upon one absolute level of equal citizenship. He who by subtlety of legal interpretation, by force, or by deceit, would deny to any citizen the free and honest use of his ballot thereby strikes at the very root of our democratic institutions.

Come and let us reason together; not in partisanship, but as citizens seeking the common good of all.

Will any gentleman upon this floor tell me that—with an election lasting but one day in a county twenty miles in length; with ballot-boxes only open at one court-house in all that county; with but four ballot-boxes provided for that one day's voting at that one court-house; with 6,000 legal voters resident within the city limits of Savannah; with more than 3,000 legal voters living upon the plantations and among the rice fields of that large county, outside the city—such an election so held could be more than a farce if it were not an outrage? Will any gentleman tell me that such an election could have been so conducted for any purpose or with any motive other than the single one of disfranchising the colored and poor voters of the country precincts? Will any gentleman tell me that the successful attempt to so construe a series of election laws as to justify this practical disfranchisement would not be to destroy equity, under the mask of sustaining the technicalities of statute law?

Fortunately the statutes admit of a reasonable interpretation, that will answer and fulfill the higher ends of natural and absolute justice. I but follow the honored and life-giving rule of ancient interpretation when I seek that construction of the statute which will secure justice and enforce equity. All other interpretation is of the kind so tersely described in the words of Holy Writ: "The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth alive."

Mr. WOODFORD. I so seldom trespass on the time of the House, will not gentlemen kindly let me go on and finish my remarks? [Cries of "Go ahead."]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from New York having time to conclude his remarks?

Mr. BLOUNT. I object.

Mr. WOODFORD. Allow me one moment. For thirty days it fell to my lot to hold military command in the city of Savannah. Never during that time did I willfully or knowingly do otherwise than extend the utmost courtesy and generosity to those of my misguided fellow-countrymen who were on the wrong side in the great struggle, and who with the capture of Savannah fell under our military control. I thank the gentleman for the courtesy which is now returned me by the Representative of Georgia on the floor of this House, and yield my request for further time.

Mr. BLOUNT. It is the same courtesy that was extended to me.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Mr. Speaker, perhaps I misunderstood some of the remarks of my colleague who has just taken his seat. If he intends to concede that any vote was counted in this majority report which was not cast at a legal precinct he does not speak for the committee, and if my colleagues of the minority, or anybody else, can show that a single vote was counted by the majority of that committee not cast at a legal precinct, I will abandon this case. Why, sir, this Congress is flooded with cries, as if a baby in a big house was waked up in the night-time, because, in a congressional district which has a colored population of seventy-five thousand and odd, and a white population of fifty-four thousand and odd, the majority of this committee should propose to count in a man claiming to represent very largely that colored population, by insisting upon counting votes which it is conceded on all sides were actually cast, and the question upon which is only whether they were cast at a legal precinct or not.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The House have repeatedly decided that there may be an election officer de facto; that where people have cast their votes in good faith, believing that the officer had a right to proceed to an election, the vote will be counted, although there may be some illegality in his appointment or qualification. Is not the same thing true of an election precinct? If an election be held at a place believed by the people to be a lawful place, and otherwise duly conducted, will the legal vote there not be entitled to be counted, even though the public belief of the legality of the precinct be erroneous?

Mr. SMITH, of New York. As a lawyer I should be compelled to answer that question in the negative. My friend has had much more experience than I have had in the investigation of election cases, and perhaps I am in error. But, at any rate, we are not driven into any such position in this case.

The main question is as to these outside precincts in the county of Chatham, and the first point made is on the effect of this order of the ordinary of Chatham County:

> It being considered necessary, in order to carry out the provisions of an act of the General Assembly of the State of Georgia, entitled "An act to provide for an election, and to alter and amend the laws in relation to the holding of elections," approved the 3d day of October, 1870, to establish an election precinct in Chatham County, it is therefore ordered that the city of Savannah be, and is hereby, made an election precinct, the place of receiving the votes at said election to be hereafter designated.
> A. W. STONE,
> Ordinary Chatham County.

Now I call the attention of the House to the fact that that introductory clause stands to the enacting clause in precisely the relation of the preamble to a statute of Congress or of a Legislature. It has the same force and effect as a preamble would have, and none other. Sir, the law is well settled that a preamble cannot be resorted to to aid the construction of a statue, unless there be some ambiguity in the statute.

I read from Smith on Construction. Chief Justice Wills says:

> If the words of an act of Parliament be in doubt, it may be proper to have recourse to the preamble to find out the meaning of the Legislature; but where the words of the enacting part are plain and express, I do not think they ought to be restrained by the preamble, for the preamble may only recite some particular mischiefs that will happen; but the enacting clause may not only be calculated to prevent those mischiefs, but also others of a like nature.

Mr. Speaker, the law is well settled, and it will not be controverted by any gentleman upon the minority of this committee, that the effect of that order of the ordinary was to establish permanent precincts at these outside polls in the county of Chatham. Then the question recurs, have they been abolished? Now, sir, the minority of the committee, on page 33 of their report, referring to the act of 1870, say:

> Its repealing clause is broad and general, and it manifestly terminated the legal existence of these precincts, if they had any legal existence after the election of 1868.

The minority have put themselves squarely upon the position that the Legislature repealed those precincts, and yet during this argument the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAWLS] called attention to the fact that the constitution of Georgia in explicit terms prohibits the Legislature from changing or abolishing election precincts. It is in section 6, article 1, of the constitution of Georgia, which absolutely takes away all power of the Legislature to interfere with election precincts.

Now, sir, the attention of the House should, perhaps, be called again to the fact that every man who voted at these precincts is recorded in this book of testimony. Whether he had paid his tax could be proved by reference to the assessment-rolls and records of the county; and the allegation is not made against a single one of them that he was a disqualified voter.

Now, was it necessary to hold these elections at these outside precincts? Every election held between 1868 and 1872, except the election of 1870, had been held under military order, and that military order in every case had prescribed the precincts and the election law of 1870, and provided that elections should be held for three days—held at the county seats—and that no challenges should be allowed to voters. It was a special law which did not apply to elections held at any other time.

Mr. SPEER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York be permitted to finish his remarks.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I think the House is tired of the debate. There are other things I would have wished to say, but I must now call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOODFORD] in his seat.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I beg pardon; I thought the reference of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] was to myself. I have no objection to my colleague [Mr. WOODFORD] proceeding.

Mr. WOODFORD. More deeply than I can well express, I thank the gentleman on the other side of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER,] for his marked courtesy. But as the debate has already proceeded to an extent that must weary the patience of the House, I shall not detain the House any longer.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Hon. Morgan Rawls is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the first congressional district of Georgia in the Forty-third Congress.

Resolved, That Hon. Andrew Sloan is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the first congressional district of Georgia in the Forty-third Congress.

The SPEAKER. As an amendment to these resolutions, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] offers on behalf of a minority of the Committee on Elections the resolution which the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Hon. Morgan Rawls, the sitting member, was duly elected, and is entitled to the seat occupied by him in this House as the Representative from the first district of Georgia in the Forty-third Congress.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on the amendment.

Mr. SPEER. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 77, nays 131, not voting 82; as follows:

So the amendment was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. EDEN. I am paired with the gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. WILSHIRE. If he were here he would vote "no," and I should vote "ay."

Mr. SHEATS. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. SLOSS. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

Mr. HAVENS. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. CRITTENDEN. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

Mr. DUNNELL. I am paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. WELLS. If he were present he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. My colleague, Mr. CREAMER, is confined to the house by sickness. If he were here he would vote "ay."

Mr. SLOSS. I understand that it has been announced that I was paired with one of my colleagues. I was requested by him to pair, but refused. My vote is recorded in the affirmative.

Mr. SHEATS. Then I vote "no."

The SPEAKER. The votes of both gentlemen will be received.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the resolutions reported by the committee.

Mr. SPEER. By request I call the yeas and nays on the adoption of those resolutions.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 135, nays 74, not voting 81; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Begole, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Stephen A. So the resolutions reported by the majority of the committee were adopted.

During the roll-call,

Mr. DUNNELL said: I again announce that upon this question I am paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. WELLS. If present he would on this vote be in the negative, and I would be in the affirmative.

Mr. HYDE moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SLOAN then presented himself and took the modified oath required by the act of July 11, 1868.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. No. 245) for the relief of William Rood, late a private of the Thirty-sixth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the transportation bill.

Mr. COX. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. McCRARY. I ask unanimous consent for an evening session for debate on the transportation bill.

Mr. COX. Then I will modify my motion to take a recess.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire, if possible, that we may come to some understanding now as to the time when the vote will be taken on the transportation bill. If we can fix an early hour for that purpose, I hope the House will waive all other considerations and work up to it. But if we are going on day after day and evening after evening without limit, I must antagonize that bill with the appropriation bills. I wish the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] would indicate some time for a vote.

Mr. MAYNARD. Permit me to suggest, if the gentleman will allow me, that the vote on yesterday indicated a very strong desire on the part of the House to take up the currency bill. I have been appealed to by gentlemen on both sides of the House to bring that bill forward. While I do not wish to antagonize the transportation bill, I shall find it incumbent upon me, I shall feel obliged, unless the gentleman can before long bring us to a vote on that subject, to ask that it be postponed in order that the currency bill may be taken up and considered. I do not wish to be discourteous or unkind in any way, but the pressure is very great.

Mr, McCRARY. But three members of the Committee on Railways and Canals have spoken upon the pending bill. I am as anxious as any gentleman can be to reach a vote on the bill. I hope to be able to call the previous question some time to-morrow, if the House will go on now until the usual time for adjournment and give us the evening for debate.

Mr. SCOFIELD. How many speeches in all have been delivered upon the subject?

Mr. McCRARY. I cannot say. But in order to accommodate the House and advance business, we have had the most of our debate on this important question on Saturdays and at evening sessions; we have occupied but two days which would otherwise have been occupied with other subjects. I will say to the House that I will call the previous question at the earliest possible moment I can do so without discourtesy to my colleagues on the committee who may insist upon being heard. As long as any member of the Committee on Railways and Canals insists upon being heard I do not think it would be courteous for me to call the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let me make a suggestion. It is always easier to fix a distant hour than an immediate one. If the gentleman will now suggest an hour, I have no doubt that members of the committee can work up to it; but if we let the matter run to be fixed at some future time, we have no certainty as to when the question will be brought to a vote.

Mr. RANDALL. It seems to me that if we go on with the regular order we shall proceed with more rapidity than by wasting time in undertaking to make arrangements.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has twice expressed the hope that some arrangement might be arrived at that would prevent a daily conflict about the order of business. No time is more unprofitably spent in the House than that occupied by disputes over the order of business.

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot conceive that it is discourteous to decline to give the floor to members of the committee, to be by them farmed out, as has been done in a large share of our debating this session. If a member of the committee desires the floor, to occupy it himself, I am the last man that would object; but where the proposition is (and it has been done in many cases within our experience) that the floor shall be given to the members of the committee and by them farmed out to others, I think the rule of courtesy does not apply.

Mr. RANDALL. I think that others besides members of committees have rights here.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think so too.

Mr. RANDALL. Members of committees, I concede, have, according to custom, the first right.

Mr. GARFIELD. One of the most important measures of this session was settled yesterday without any debate at all; and if we are going to reach any practical legislation this session we must have some reasonable restriction upon discussion.

Mr. McCRARY. I will say to the House that if the interval between this time and four o'clock to-morrow be given to the discussion of this question, I will at that time ask the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Upon that understanding let us agree.

Mr. McCRARY. And that there shall be an evening session this evening.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman that he make his request in this form: that the previous question shall be considered pending at four o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. McCRARY. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] is that the remainder of to-day's session, and the session of to-morrow up to four o'clock, be devoted to the consideration of the transportation bill, and that at four o'clock to-morrow the previous question shall be considered as operating.

Mr. McCRARY. I shall be quite content with that arrangement.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that arrangement will be made.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I object to any such arrangement. I have no objection to a vote of the House being taken at that time; but we desire an opportunity to vote on amendments.

The SPEAKER. The only point embraced in this proposition to which the gentleman can object is allowing the bill to occupy the first hour to-morrow morning. The design of the gentleman from Iowa, as the Chair understands, is to occupy with this bill the entire session to-morrow. Is there objection to that?

Mr. NEGLEY. I must object.

Mr. McCRARY. Then I simply give notice that I will demand the previous question at four o'clock to-morrow, provided the consideration of the subject be not interrupted between now and then.

The SPEAKER. It will inevitably be interrupted by the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. McCRARY. Then I hope the objection will be withdrawn; because nothing would be gained by having the morning hour to-morrow, and compelling this subject to go over to the next day, which will be Thursday.

The SPEAKER. If the question should go over to Thursday as unfinished business, it would destroy the morning hour of that day. Gentlemen who are interested in the morning hour must therefore choose between allowing the debate to proceed to-morrow morning, regardless of the morning hour, or having this bill destroy the morning hour of Thursday.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope gentlemen will let the arrangement be made.

Mr. COX. I wish to put a question to the gentleman from Iowa. Does he propose to allow amendments to his bill to be voted on to-morrow?

Mr. McCRARY. I propose to move the previous question.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman propose to allow the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio to be voted upon?

Mr. McCRARY. I do not, if the previous question should be sustained.

Mr. COX. I object to any arrangement unless we can get a vote on some amendment.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It was with reference to getting a vote on amendments that I made objection to the arrangement.

The SPEAKER. The request of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] does not embody anything with reference to that matter. He desires the House now to understand that at four o'clock to-morrow he will call the previous question; and it is for the House to determine at that time whether it will admit amendments or not. The only point at issue now is whether the whole of to-morrow's session, including the time that would otherwise be devoted to the morning hour, shall be occupied with the consideration of this bill.

A MEMBER. Does that require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It does; because, this bill being a special order for half-past one, the gentleman from Iowa desires that the hour and a half to-morrow before that time shall be devoted to the consideration of this bill. If consent to that arrangement be refused, and if the previous question to-morrow afternoon be seconded, the bill may interfere with the morning hour of the next day.

Mr. ELDREDGE. My only reason for objecting——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] made the objection.

Mr. MERRIAM. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it be to meet at ten o'clock to-morrow morning. That will give more time for debate.

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent.

Several MEMBERS objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is pressed by many gentlemen who are interested in the order of business to have some arrangement made. Of course it is only for the Chair to submit questions; but he does hope that some definite arrangement (of course the House will decide what it shall be) may be arrived at. The suggestion now is that the House meet at ten o'clock to-morrow morning, and only for debate up to twelve o'clock.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. McCRARY. I understand the reason on the part of some gentlemen for objecting is that they desire to have a vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SMITH.] If that would harmonize all concerned, I would agree there may be a vote on that proposition; that that might be included in the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa modifies his suggestion, by agreeing that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio may be considered as pending, and that the previous question shall operate on that amendment as well as on the bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I object, unless the House determine the question of amendments. It will not certainly appear to the House what amendments the House may adopt until after the debate is closed. I object to it simply on the ground that the House ought to have the privilege at the end of the debate to determine what amendments it will adopt.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Iowa will consent at the close of debate on this bill that it shall be open for amendments. It is an entirely new subject of legislation, and it seems highly proper, as well as reasonable, that amendments should be allowed on the part of the House.

Mr. McCRARY. I perceive, Mr. Speaker, we will be able to reach no other conclusion, and I will simply announce that the committee, having considered this bill with great care, deem it their duty to pass upon it as reported at four o'clock to-morrow. If I can get the floor I will demand the previous question on the bill as reported. If the House desires it to be open to amendment, that can be done by voting down the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa, chairman of the Committee on Railways and Canals, gives notice that to-morrow, at four o'clock, he will call the previous question on the pending bill. The Chair will recognize him at that hour for that purpose.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is it in order to move we have a session to-night for debate?

The SPEAKER. The Chair heard no objection to that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Does that take away the morning hour to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. There was no arrangement to that effect.

Mr. MERRIAM. I move that when the House takes a recess to-night it be till ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. That would require a recess. It would be a continuation of this day's session. The House has already agreed to take a recess instead of an adjournment—to have a session this evening for debate only.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Will it be in the power of the House, at the close of the session this evening, to take a further recess until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, because the condition on which the recess was asked for this evening was that it should be for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted, and that would be an essential alteration of the rule providing for an hour at which the House shall meet, which would be business of a pretty large nature.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is hardly in order now, I suppose, to move when the House adjourns, which will be for to-night, or rather when we take a recess, that, at the end of the evening session, instead of adjourning to meet to-morrow at twelve o'clock, the House shall take a further recess until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock, the two hours between ten and twelve to be devoted to debate only, no business whatever to be transacted?

The SPEAKER. That changes the rule of the House. The House meets at twelve o'clock m. by rule. The gentleman's motion proposes a suspension of that rule.

Mr. MERRIAM. I ask unanimous consent that such shall be the agreement.

Mr. GARFIELD. That at the conclusion of the evening session, instead of adjourning until to-morrow, the House will take a further recess until ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The rules do not permit it. You cannot provide for taking a recess at a future time. You can move co instanti that a recess be taken, but you cannot move that a recess be taken an hour and a half hence.

Mr. GARFIELD. But a recess has been ordered for this evening.

The SPEAKER. It has been agreed by unanimous consent that the House shall take a recess, in order to have an evening session for debate only. To the session for this evening the Chair heard no objection, and it is to be for debate only.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not hear the expression "for debate only."

The SPEAKER. That has been the usual condition upon which evening sessions for debate have been granted. The Chair is probably in the same line of desire with the gentleman from Ohio, but he is here to administer the rules.

Mr. MERRIAM. Can there be unanimous consent for another amendment?

The SPEAKER. Of course, but that has been objected to. The Chair will submit it again. At the termination of this evening's session is there objection to taking a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow morning?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is for debate only until twelve o'clock.

Mr. MCCRARY. I hope there will be no objection to devoting from ten o'clock to-morrow morning until twelve o'clock for debate only, no business to be transacted.

The SPEAKER. At the request of the gentleman who has charge of the bill the Chair will again ask whether there is objection to taking a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow morning from ten to twelve, to be devoted to debate only—no business whatever to be transacted. That session to-morrow would be a continuation of this day's session, and would be so journalized. It requires unanimous consent. The Chair puts the question to the House again.

Mr. RANDALL. I again object.

[Subsequently Mr. RANDALL withdrew his objection, and the session for ten o'clock was ordered.]

Mr. POTTER. I rise to a parliamentary question. Unanimous consent having been given to a session this evening for debate, will it not be in order to move at the conclusion of that session to take a recess until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock?

The SPEAKER. It would not.

EVIDENCE BEFORE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report the resolution which I send to the desk, and to ask its adoption by the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means are hereby authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers and administer oaths in all matters from time to time pending and under examination before said committee.

Mr. SENER. I do not object; but I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact, that when the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice asked for such power, it was objected to on this side of the House, on the ground that it was an unusual power to give.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] whether this should not be limited to a particular subject. There are no limits to the broad power which this gives to the committee.

Mr. DAWES. The same power was given to the committee in the last Congress, and almost in the same words.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no idea that it will be abused by the committee; still I think it would be better to have it limited to a particular subject.

The resolution was adopted.

IRRIGATION IN CALIFORNIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have the honor to transmit herewith the report of the board of commissioners on the irrigation of the San Joaquin, Tulare, and Sacramento Valleys, of the State of California, and also the original maps accompanying said report.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, D. C., March 23, 1874.

The message was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 583) making an appropriation to defray the expenses of the Joint Select Committee to Inquire into the Affairs of the District of Columbia.

ARMY APPROPRIATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2654) to amend section 2 of an act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1872, and for other purposes, and the acts amendatory thereof; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW, ETC.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. I am requested by the Workingmen's Union of New York to present a memorial to the House of Representatives in favor of the eight-hour law, and praying for the removal of Mr. Mullett, Supervising Architect of the Treasury. This memorial is signed by 20,000 citizens, representing the Typographical Union and various trade and labor societies of New York; and in presenting it I desire to express my full approval of the objects of the memorial. I request that it be read at the Clerk's desk, and that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD without the names.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is this in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not, except by consent.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. I desire to have the memorial referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service; and I also request that it may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object to its being printed in the RECORD.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. If it were a petition coming from the wealthy bankers of New York, the gentleman would not object. But when it comes from the workingmen he objects.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman had better not attempt to measure other people's grain in his own half-bushel.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. I measure you by your act.

Mr. MAYNARD. I shall not bandy words further with the gentleman. I have a right to make the objection, and I insist upon it.

Mr. MYERS rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MYERS. I rose to object to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] proceeding; but I see he has concluded what he had to say.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the objection of the gentleman from Tennessee to extend to the printing of the memorial for the use of the House?

Mr. MAYNARD. No, sir; my objection was to reading it and putting it in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The memorial will be printed, and referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1385) to regulate commerce by railroad among the several States. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, when this subject of the regulation of rates of transportation of merchandise among the States was last before the House, I obtained the floor by the courtesy of a member of the committee, the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. STONE;] and I was prepared at that time to speak with more method and directness than I shall now be able to do. If I proceed, therefore, in a somewhat desultory way, and with little attention to the logical order of my remarks, I hope this will be a partial excuse for so doing.

I deem it a favorable circumstance, in connection with this discussion, that it cannot fairly be said to take a party character. Gentlemen who have been always and still are associated with the democratic party have spoken in favor of this bill, and announced their purpose to vote for it. Gentlemen upon this side of the House, who have always acted with the republican party, have criticised sharply many of the features of the bill, and have announced their purpose of voting against it in its present shape. It does not, therefore, seem possible, Mr. Speaker, that party lines can or ought to be drawn in the settlement of so important a question as the proposed measure presents for the consideration of this body.

I know, sir, that in the discussion on the bill something has been said of State rights, as though that were a party tenet, as though one side of this House held exclusively the doctrine that the States had certain rights as against the Federal Government, and the other side of this House held the doctrine that the States had no rights as against the Federal Government. Now, sir, from my observation of political parties, and of the divisions that have taken place upon this question of State rights, I have not discovered that it can fairly be said to be a party question. It is not a principle; it is only a weapon, and the weapon of the party that is in a minority in the country. The party that is out of power in the Federal Government is always the party to assert and insist upon this doctrine of State rights, and the party that is in power, whatever may be its professions, whatever may be its platform, is more or less the party that always ignores or overrides State rights.

Why, sir, it is in the memory of every member on this floor that at the time of the enactment of the fugitive-slave law the party in power, the democratic party, stretched the doctrine of Federal control over matters of that sort beyond what had been claimed as possible by the whig party before that time. We all know that the State of Massachusetts, then a republican State, and the State of Wisconsin, then a republican State, and almost every republican State throughout the North, by their Legislatures, by their resolutions, and by the directions they gave to their State officials, insisted that the States had rights as against the Federal Government which they would not surrender. The question of what these rights are, or where the dividing line shall be drawn in each particular instance, is not a political question, and ought never to be made a political question. It is a question of good government and wise legislation as much as a question of constitutional power; a question, independent of the limitations of the Constitution, of what is the best jurisdiction and where is the best legislative body to solve the various problems that arise in the administration of public affairs throughout the United States. It is a question how far the local governments are a better jurisdiction to settle these questions than the Federal Government, and how far the Federal Government is a better jurisdiction to settle these questions than the local governments. Some powers, as a matter of course, have been and must be conceded to the Federal Government, because the Federal Government alone can properly exercise such powers; and wherever such powers are granted to the General Government by the Constitution, as a matter of course the legality and constitutionality of their exercise are beyond question. But it does not follow even then, Mr. Speaker, were it settled that the power is a constitutional power, and that Congress had authority within the Constitution to exercise a given power, that therefore it must exercise it whenever anybody asks for its exercise; or that any measure which is not open to a constitutional objection is therefore wise and judicious.

Now, sir, the question has been argued in this case by some who support this bill much as though the only point to be settled here was the power of the Federal Government, or of the Congress of the United States, to regulate interstate commerce; as though, that point once settled, there was no escape from an affirmative vote on this bill. Now, I do not see why there is any occasion to deny, for political reasons or any other, or for the sake of making an argument against this bill, that the Federal Government has the same power and the same authority to regulate interstate commerce that it has to regulate foreign commerce. The terms of the grant in the Constitution are identical, and of course the power must be the same in the one case as in the other. But, sir, when you get beyond that, and proceed to consider what a regulation of commerce is, and what the regulation of commerce is that is proposed by this bill, and whether the propositions in this bill do not antagonize and are not hostile to other provisions of the Constitution, we meet at once, it seems to me, the very gravest and most serious objection to the measure we are now considering.

The bill provides in general terms for the appointment of a commission of nine persons, who shall have power, without any appeal from their decision, except the appeal that is subsequently provided for in the courts, to determine what is a reasonable price for the transportation of freight over any railroad in the country that has a through connection.

These prices, having been once established by this board, are to be held, in all proceedings that may arise under them, as prima facie reasonable rates to be charged upon these roads; and the burden of proof is thereafter to be put upon the roads, if they attempt to attack such rates, to prove that they are less than a reasonable charge for transportation of freight over such roads.

We have as a starting point in the Constitution this provision in respect to the regulation of commerce. First, "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce among the several States." Very well. Then there is a provision that by no regulation of commerce shall preference be given to the ports of one State over those of another State. So it will be seen that we have really gained little or nothing in determining what the power of Congress is in respect to the regulation of interstate commerce, when that power is conceded, inasmuch as any exercise of that power must be subject to all the limitations expressed or implied in other parts of the organic law, and is especially subject to the limitation as to the preference of the ports of one State over those of another. And it is noticeable that the provision that one port shall not have preference over another port by any regulation of commerce is more imperative than the provision "that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce;" because one is permissive and not mandatory, the other is prohibitory. Here, then, is one very significant limitation. What further?

I suppose no gentleman here will contend that any regulation of commerce is not open to constitutional objection which is not uniform, and by that I mean uniform in its operations. I understand that the Constitution does not in terms say that the regulations of commerce must be uniform in their operation. Congress may make uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy; and certain legislation, like naturalization laws and tariff laws, must be uniform by the express terms of the Constitution. But I suppose no one will pretend for a moment, although the word "uniform" is not used in the Constitution in that connection, that regulations of commerce need not necessarily be uniform. In other words, there must be no injustice and no inequality in any respect in any regulations of commerce adopted by the Congress of the United States. All regulations must be alike. It must be one law for all, one regulation for all.

For instance, it would be an unequal and unjust regulation of commerce if the Congress of the United States should declare that one class of passenger-boats might run with greater pressure of steam to the square inch than another class, because they were navigating different waters or carried fewer passengers; or to say that one class of vessels should have one kind of accommodations for passengers, and another, although similar, class of passenger-vessels should have another kind.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will it disturb the gentleman if I ask him a question at this time?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. No, sir.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to ask the gentleman whether this provision requires a uniform regulation? In regard to quarantine, one regulation of commerce would be that the port of Mobile or New Orleans, for instance, might be put in quarantine; and there might be another regulation that there was no occasion for quarantine at Portland, Maine. That would be a regulation of commerce, but it would not be uniform.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I agree with the gentleman, and for the reason that in the case he puts the regulation would only be applied to the ports where there was supposed to be need of it; but if the regulation was not applicable to every port in danger of infection it would not be uniform. It is not that if these commissioners should establish freights for one railroad and should not establish them for another, there would necessarily be a violation of what ought to be uniformity in the regulation of commerce; as it might happen that some of these roads now charge such low rates that no one would think of reducing them; although the regulation would certainly lack uniformity if the law did not make it applicable to all the railroads of the country; and it would besides be partial, unequal, and unjust. But in the very nature of the case the proposed regulation cannot be uniform. It is not one law for all, nor one price for all, and cannot be.

Let me illustrate, and I will come to the other point in relation to the ports of entry further on.

I understand that this bill is based substantially on the Illinois legislation upon this subject. As I understand, the commissioners under the Illinois legislation, or the board, or whatever it is, that settles the question there, have classed the various railroads in the State of Illinois in proportion to the net profits of the business of the road. For instance, the Chicago and Alton Railroad is put into the first class as a railroad that has $4,000 net profit per mile, while other railroads doing a less profitable business are put in other classes. There are, I think, four classes in all. They have determined in that State that freights carried over the Chicago and Alton Railroad shall pay a certain price per ton per mile; much less per ton, as I understand, than the charge for freight that is carried over other roads in the State which have not so large or profitable business. This, I agree, is just as between these roads; but it does not seem to me that it can in any sense of the word be said to be a uniform regulation. In other words, it seems to me, the objection is that, in the nature of things, it is impossible to regulate rates without establishing nearly as many different rates as there are different railroads. Can this be a uniform regulation?

Let me illustrate further. I suppose whatever else may have been in the minds of those who framed that provision of the Constitution as to the regulation of commerce, it was unquestionably contemplated that the regulations could only be made by Congress in cases where no other proper regulations could be made or established; in other words, where there was no other power competent to make regulations. Of course interstate commerce, in the ordinary sense in which we speak of it, can no more be regulated by one State than foreign commerce can be regulated by one State; we all understand that. Therefore, if it is regulated at all, it must be regulated by the Federal Government. But when we come to look at the question from the other side and see an attempt made to regulate it in some specific way, may we not say with great force that the fact that you cannot make a uniform regulation, a regulation that will apply to all railroads alike, shows that no such regulation should be attempted? Is it not evident from this aspect of the question that no such regulation was contemplated by those who made the Constitution, since it is so manifest that it must lack every element of uniformity?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Allow me to ask the gentleman whether a rule of law providing that the charges for carrying freight or passengers should reach only a reasonable sum, and no more, would not be uniform in every constitutional and legal sense, although the reasonable sum might vary in each particular case?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. So far as that question is pertinent to the discussion I will reply to it, although I was intending in another part of my argument to make allusion to common carriers.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. My question relates directly to the point the gentleman is now discussing.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not understand, Mr. Speaker, that the regulation of rates of freight transported by common carriers is based upon the power of governments to regulate commerce; and

I suppose that whenever that regulation is resorted to, the sovereign power resorting to it would have the right to decide arbitrarily in the particular circumstances what should be the nature of the measure adopted.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The gentleman does not understand my point. He is arguing that different railroads in different circumstances may charge different rates for the same character of freight carried similar distances; and hence he urges that it is impossible for us to adopt a regulation which shall be uniform. Now, my question is whether a rule of law which should require the railroads in each specific case to charge only a reasonable sum, and which should provide a means of ascertaining the sum and enforcing the obligation, would not be uniform within the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I think it clear that it would not be uniform in the sense intended by the Constitution. The word "uniform" is not used in the Constitution in respect to the regulation of commerce; and I have suggested this as a serious difficulty. and because it seemed to me to be a strong objection to any congressional interference with this matter, that it is quite impossible for Congress to adopt any rule that will apply to any two railroads alike. A reasonable rate cannot be a uniform rate, unless it is the same rate for equal distances, any more than a reasonable price for a commodity to be sold in the market would be a uniform price when different prices were fixed for the same commodity.

But, sir, let me call attention to the other provision of the Constitution, that no regulation of commerce shall give any preference to the ports of one State over those of another. Now, I hold that it is utterly impossible for the provisions of this bill to be carried out without bringing about precisely such a result; in other words, it is utterly impossible for nine men to attempt to regulate freights, however honestly they may set about the work, without preferring one port of the United States to another.

To illustrate: The city of Boston gets a large amount of freights from the West, that come in part over the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, and over the Central Vermont Railway in Vermont, or by way of Portland; and in summer partly by water, via Ogdensburgh. I apprehend that if an examination were made it would be found that in fact the Erie Railroad, the New York Central, the Pennsylvania Central perhaps, and the Baltimore and Ohio—those roads which have the shortest lines, taken altogether, from the West to the sea-board—fix the rates for the long lines; and that the long lines are obliged to agree to those rates, whatever they may be, because otherwise they do not get the freight. Gentlemen living in New England, especially those who reside in the vicinity of Boston, understand that the Vermont Central line, which carries much of this freight through my State to Boston, has been the line largely relied upon by Boston merchants and shippers as their line of transportation to and from the West. They have always felt a strong interest in it, though not, perhaps, so strong as their interest in the Boston and Albany road. What is the consequence? They have put their money largely into that road, and they have not expected large, if any, dividends on their money so invested, and certainly have not been disappointed in that respect. They cared much more to get their freight from the West to the sea-board cheaply, and from the sea-board back to the West cheaply, than they did about getting dividends on the $5,000, or $10,000, or $50,000 each that they might have put into that corporation. The capital that they invested in it went out of sight within five years after the building of the road, not by any dishonest management of the road, but because its business would not support it; because these Boston merchants insisted—and they insisted rightly, and the managers of the road looked upon the matter much in the same light—that freight should be brought over that line from the West to Boston as cheaply as it could be brought to New York by the Erie and New York Central roads. That road has carried freight right past my town from Chicago to Boston, month after month, at twenty-five cents per hundred pounds, the distance being more than a thousand miles; while we have been charged for the same classes of freight from Montpelier, Vermont, to Boston, a distance of two hundred miles, from seventy-five cents to ninety cents per hundred pounds. Carrying through freight in that way from the West to the sea-board, that road has helped to build up Chicago and other towns of Illinois, and of States farther west; it has contributed vastly to their development; while we at home have been charged upon our local freights as much for our short distances as has been charged to those who live a thousand miles beyond us toward the Mississippi River for the long distances which separate them from the sea-board.

And yet this railroad in my State was obliged to carry freight at that rate because the New York Central and the New York and Erie were carrying freight at that rate to Boston and New York, and in order to help Boston trade, and Boston merchants who had put their money into that road, they carried these freights for a good deal less than cost from the West to the sea-board, and made up in some degree their loss in that respect by charging to us at home who live alongside that railroad five or six times as much, ay, ten or twenty times as much per mile, as they charged these foreign shippers. Now, sir, this is not right, but it is a matter which cannot be regulated by statute. It will not be regulated by this statute. That road will have to carry freights at whatever price is fixed by the New York Central or the New York and Erie, or it cannot get them to carry. And if this commission should fix the rate of freights at five mills per ton per mile, or less, over the New York Central and the New York and Erie, the road in my State will have to carry them at the same rate or it will not get the freights. What will be the result? It will carry at that rate, and possibly less than that rate, and then it will turn around and grind us at home between the upper and nether millstone. It will put the burden upon our local freights from town to town in the State. It gives these low rates to foreigners, to persons who live a thousand miles away from the line of the road, but as compensation for it it charges higher rates upon us. There is no redress. We could not have any redress if we tried.

A commission in Vermont would be obliged to say that this national regulation is of superior right, if it has any right at all, and would be compelled to allow our railroads to charge a larger rate for short distances and for local freights, that they might earn enough to pay more than running expenses. They would be obliged, if a commission were established in my State on the same basis as the one in Illinois, to let these railroads charge exorbitant local rates in order that they might thus compensate themselves for the loss on through freight from distant points.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will consider how this regulation of rates of freight will interfere with the constitutional prohibition against preferring the ports of one State over those of another by a regulation of commerce. It seems to me to be apparent that such regulation as is contemplated by the proposed legislation will inevitably bring about such a result. Portland and Boston are farther from the Mississippi than New York or Baltimore, and are the termini, therefore, of the longer and less profitable lines of railroads. Rates, therefore, from the West over these longer lines will be fixed at a larger maximum per ton per mile than over the shorter lines; and as the bill forbids discrimination in favor of one shipper and against another, the longer and poorer lines will be obliged to reduce rates for all if they reduce them for any customers. This they cannot do and leave any margin for interest on their investments; and as the shorter lines are to be compelled to take all freight offered, the termini of these roads will most certainly thus be preferred as points of shipment, or New York, or Philadelphia, or Baltimore will have preference over Portland or Boston. The New York Central, the Pennsylvania Central, the Baltimore and Ohio, while allowed to charge less possibly than now, could still do a profitable business. They could carry freight, doubling their capacity for that purpose if need be, and perhaps would make more money than now, while these longer and less favored lines would be driven from the business of carrying these long freights, and could only transport the merchandise that might be shipped from point to point along their roads. Is it not thus clear that you would give preference to one port over another? And the same would be true if you fixed the rates for freight and passengers from any foreign port to the United States. Suppose, under some law similar to this bill, the fare for passengers from Liverpool to Boston should be a certain amount, while that for passengers from Liverpool to New York would be greater, the price being fixed by the mile; passengers coming from Liverpool to Baltimore, Savannah, or Charleston, the distance being greater, would pay more still. Would not that regulation be a regulation on the face of it which preferred one port to another? It seems to me clear that it would; and yet it is inevitable that it should be so in any attempt to regulate the matter of prices for transportation.

Admitting that the commissioners will be as honest and intelligent gentlemen as can be found in the United States, men who sincerely desire to make a schedule of rates which shall be in all respects just and reasonable, yet it would be impossible for them to do it without making this preference of the ports of one State over those of another.

Mr. FORT. I ask my friend from Vermont whether in arranging a schedule of rates the commissioners are bound to take into consideration that distance regardless of all other considerations?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It provides for fixing reasonable rates which must be with respect to the distance. A long line which has the least business will be allowed to charge larger rates, but shorter lines like the New York Central and Erie will be required to charge less. Rates will be fixed on such lines so low that the longer lines cannot carry except at rates much less than would be fixed as reasonable for them.

Mr. FORT. They are not bound to do it.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. They are not bound to do it, but they will have to do it or not get the freights. But as to these other roads—indeed as to all roads—the bill contemplates a compulsory process to compel them to carry freights at such rates as may be fixed. It has been said in the course of the debate that the New York Central had largely watered its stock, and its rates were adjusted with reference to paying dividends on the whole of that stock. The desire of those urging this bill is to bring such roads down to hard-pan; to find out what was their actual cost, and to grade the price of freights on that actual cost and the running expenses, which we all understand would bring the rates below what they now are on such roads. Yet the long roads are now carrying their through freight in many instances at less than cost, and if you cut down the rates on competing roads they cannot except at ruinous sacrifices engage in this competition, and the business must thus necessarily be diverted from the long roads, thus bringing about as the result a preference of one road to another, and as a consequence the preference of the ports at the termini of such roads over the ports less favorably situated.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have been led by questions addressed to me a little away from the order in which I proposed to discuss this bill; and inasmuch as I have so begun I may as well go on in this desultory manner and speak of other considerations that have occurred to me during my examination of it. It has been argued that common carriers must carry for a reasonable price, and that Congress may therefore, as a regulation of commerce, compel railroads to carry freight at a reasonable price. Now, I have not been able to see any connection, so far as the constitutional power of regulating commerce is concerned, between that and the law with respect to common carriers. We cannot take charge of these railroads, we cannot regulate freights upon these railroads because they are common carriers. This is not the way we get the power, if we have it at all. We get the power of regulation, so far as we have it at all, because they engage in commerce between the States; and they may be engaged in this commerce, not as common carriers, but quite independently of that, as express companies, or in any other way. Our power comes from the provision of the Constitution to regulate commerce. The question whether they are common carriers has nothing to do with it; nor has the fact that at the time of the adoption of our Constitution the Parliament of England had by statute fixed rates of freight over the highways of the kingdom of Great Britain. The two powers are distinct, and should not be confounded in the consideration of this bill. The only question is, is the measure embodied in this bill a proper exercise of the constitutional power of Congress to regulate commerce; and the analogies that are attempted to be found, therefore, in any government regulation of common carriers, whether ancient or modern, are misleading, untrustworthy, and deceptive.

And so, sir, when the common law has been stated here in respect to common carriers, it seems to me that that is not pertinent to this inquiry. I have been unable to find any case which fully maintains the law that has been quoted here so often in respect to common carriers. I find enough dicta of the law writers to the effect that common carriers can only charge a reasonable rate; but I have been unable to find a case where suit has been brought against them for refusing in advance to carry goods at rates they had previously fixed. Suits have been brought in many cases where they took the merchandise and transported it without anything being said as to the price; and in the end the courts held that the price they exacted was too large, and they were only allowed to retain what their services were worth. But I have not been able to find a case, and none has been cited, where that precise question has been before the court and it has been denied that a railroad or other common carrier had a right to make a contract or fix the price which it should receive for transporting freight or passengers. And considering that, as is asserted, this has been the law for a hundred years, it is singular that some such case should never have arisen, and the courts should not have settled long ago that it was already within their province to regulate this matter of freight and the rates for carrying passengers on railroads.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Does not the gentleman find in the ancient English cases the declarations are very numerous that that is the rule of law?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have found such declarations, but I have always found the case to be something else.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one other question?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Has not the gentleman in his researches also found that it was the ancient English practice to regulate the charge of the public carrier on merchandise by the court of sessions fixing in advance his rates?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. O yes, Mr. Speaker; the English Parliament passed a law providing that a certain commission, the court of sessions I think it was, should regulate rates over the highways of England. I so understand it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. So that is it not true that when our Constitution was adopted our fathers found that the habit of fixing by a commission the rates for public carriers for merchandise was an ancient English regulation of commerce?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. My recollection is that this country separated itself from Great Britain in a considerable degree because it did not like English laws, and I have never supposed that they adopted as laws in this country any laws other than those that the courts might hold were just and proper. Now, I do agree that the Parliament of England had regulated freights by statute. I agree that our State Legislatures have power to regulate the price for carrying freights. The Parliament of England regulated many other things; they regulated the price of bread; they granted monopolies; they regulated the price of grain in the earlier history of the country. They considered that they had the prerogative to regulate almost everything that subjects of the realm did. But I do not suppose, because they did such things, that we have the same power; or if we had, could wisely exercise it. I hope that we have got away from the state and government regulations that used to prevail in the earlier history of civilization, and I should like some better precedents for such a bill as this than the old English method of regulating by Parliament or royal decree everything which the subjects of that realm might undertake to do. The law in regard to common carriers, where there is no statutory regulation, is well settled; but we all know that our Legislatures are continually passing laws releasing to some extent common carriers from these ancient liabilities, releasing innkeepers from some of the old common-law liabilities, and allowing them to make special contracts in particular cases, limiting their liabilities by notice to their customers. Our Legislatures have agreed that they ought to be allowed by contract to limit their liabilities; that A and B, as citizens of the country, are better able to settle their own matters between themselves and determine what liabilities shall rest upon each, than the Government is to settle the matter for them. Indeed, sir, modern civilization, as I am glad to believe, is losing faith in the sovereign virtue of legislative enactments to cure all evils in the body-politic, and is, I hope, approaching the conclusion that the best way to develop men or states is to give the individual the greatest freedom consistent with order, and leave him to work out for himself his own destiny.

Mr. Speaker, in calling attention to two or three authorities on this subject, in respect to whether a regulation of commerce can properly be pushed to the extent provided for in this bill, I shall be obliged in part to go over some of the ground which has already been traversed by those who have preceded me in the debate, since the authorities have been thoroughly examined and quoted very fully. I have one or two authorities, however, which I have not seen referred to, and to which I will call the attention of the House.

It has been asserted here that this right to regulate freights grows out of the power to regulate commerce. I have discussed that to some extent already, and have given some of the reasons why I do not think the right exists to the extent claimed in this bill. I do not think the authorities cited here in the argument go to the extent asserted in this measure by any means; in fact, the decisions of the court upon this question, so far as they approach this particular point, are always adverse to the claim of those who advocate this proposed legislation. In the Passaic Bridge case, which I believe has not been referred to, the decision was rendered by Mr. Justice Grier. The case, it will be remembered, was an action brought to remove a bridge that had been built by the State authorities over the Passaic River. The court held that although it was an obstruction to commerce, yet they did not think it was such a bridge as the State had not the power to erect in the absence of congressional legislation on that subject. Mr. Justice Grier, in the course of an opinion printed in 3 Wallace, uses this language:

> Canals, turnpikes, bridges and railroads are as necessary to the commerce between and through the several States as rivers, yet Congress has never pretended to regulate them. When a city is made a port of entry, Congress does not thereby assume to regulate its harbor, or detract from the sovereign rights before exercised by each State over her own public rivers. Congress may establish post-offices and post-roads; but this does not affect or control the absolute power of the State over its highways and bridges. If a State does not desire the accommodation of mails at certain places, and will not make roads and bridges on which to transport them, Congress cannot compel it to do so, or require it to receive favors by compulsion. Constituting a town or city a port of entry is an act for the convenience and benefit of such place and its commerce; but for the sake of this benefit the Constitution does not require the State to surrender her control over the harbor or the highways leading to it, either by land or water, provided all citizens of the United States enjoy the same privileges which are enjoyed by her own.

Here the court say in very plain language that the power of the State over its own canals, railroads, turnpikes, bridges, &c., is exclusive, and that Congress gets no power over them to regulate them in any way by virtue of the power to regulate commerce.

I accidentally came upon another authority, which has not been presented to the House, and is not, I believe, in any printed volume of reports. While looking over the letter of the Secretary of War with a view to making up my mind in respect to what I ought to do as a legislator here in regard to the Louisville and Portland Canal project, now pending before the House, I found an opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Miller, who has been quoted on this floor as much as any member of the Supreme Court of the United States as authority in favor of congressional regulation of freights or tolls on railroads.

Now, if the House will be patient with me long enough to state as briefly as possible what this case is, they will see the point of the authority as I quote it. The Portland and Louisville Canal was originally built by the State of Kentucky, or by a corporation created by the State for the purpose, and tolls were allowed to be levied for the use of the canal. Gradually the United States became the owner of all the stock except five shares. After it had become the owner of such stock, application was made to Congress for leave to mortgage the canal, issue bonds on that security, and go on enlarging and improving it. Bonds were issued on the strength of that permission to the amount of nearly $1,500,000, and the canal was mortgaged for that purpose. Those bonds are still outstanding. After that the United States made an appropriation for work on the canal, I think in 1872, and I read an extract from that appropriation bill:

> For continuing the work on the canal at the Falls of the Ohio River, $300,000. And the Secretary of War is hereby directed to report to Congress at its next session, or sooner, if practicable, the condition of said canal, and the provisions necessary to relieve the same from incumbrance, with a view to such legislation as will render the same free to commerce at the earliest practicable period, subject only to such tolls as may be necessary for the superintendence and repair thereof, which shall not, after the passage of this act, exceed five cents per ton.

I ask gentlemen to mark the phraseology of this provision, "subject to such tolls as may be necessary, &c., which shall not, after the passage of this act, exceed five cents per ton." This is the first instance I have found of legislation by Congress to regulate the rate of freight.

Here was an act of Congress providing that after a certain time tolls on this canal should not exceed five cents per ton.

Now, what followed? The United States proposed to go on and make the improvement under this appropriation. The persons interested in the bonds issued by the canal company filed a petition before Mr. Justice Miller, asking to have the United States enjoined from going on with the work, and setting forth as a reason for the injunction that if they accepted this appropriation under the terms of the act they would be bound by this limitation of the rates of toll per ton to be levied upon the commerce that might pass through that canal. They asked for an injunction on that ground, in order that the security for their bonds might not be impaired. Mr. Justice Miller went over the ground somewhat at length, holding that the rights of the parties would not be imperiled in the least by allowing the work to proceed. He then used this language:

> The argument is, therefore, not without force, that Congress meant, when they said such tolls should not exceed five cents per ton after the passage of this act, such act as they contemplated in future to pass to satisfy or remove that incumbrance.

Suggesting that Congress did not mean that the toll should be regulated at five cents per ton after the passage of the act of appropriation, but only after the passage of some subsequent act, he then goes on to say:

> It must be confessed that the language is not after this construction, and that in their caution the directors might have well supposed that Congress intended to limit the tolls at once to five cents per ton.
> If this construction of the statute be correct, then I have no hesitation in saying that that part of it which so limits the tolls is void, for the plain reason that it is a legislative attempt to destroy vested rights and a taking of private property for public use without due compensation.
> I think I have shown that the prosecution of this work is for the benefit and advantage of all concerned; that it does not seriously interfere with the ordinary use of the canal, and that the accomplishment of the work will neither confer on Congress the right to regulate the toll nor validate the attempt already made to do so, if Congress really intended to make such attempt.

Now that is the only authority, to my knowledge, which goes to the very question whether Congress has power to regulate the price for carrying freight when that regulation might impair vested rights.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him one question right here, if it does not interrupt him too much?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It is only a question of time. If I can have my time extended so that I can go a little beyond the hour, I do not object to interruptions.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I wish to ask the gentleman if he does not know that Mr. Justice Miller has decided in regard to railroads that Congress has power to regulate the prices which railroads shall charge for freights?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not understand that he has so decided.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I so understand.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not understand that any such decision has been made or has been quoted in this debate. In the Clinton Bridge case, which has been quoted here, Mr. Justice Miller decided that Congress had the same power to regulate commerce by railroad that it had to regulate any other commerce. But he did not in any other particular touch the question of the regulation by Congress of the rates of freight to be charged by railroads.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I understand he did go to that extent.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Do you understand that it was so in the Clinton Bridge case?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I do.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. That is a case familiar to almost every gentleman in the House. I have read the case several times, and I have not seen that point touched upon. I do not understand that it was touched at all. The only question decided in that case was, whether the power to regulate commerce among the States authorized Congress to validate or legalize a bridge over the Mississippi; and the court held that Congress had that power. The point that Mr. Justice Miller did discuss and decide, was, that Congress had the same power to regulate commerce by railroads as to regulate commerce on navigable waters. I suppose the right to be precisely the same in the two cases.

Mr. TREMAIN. As this is a new question to me, I would like to put an inquiry to the gentleman. In his judgment, would there not be a distinction between the case he cites and the cases relied on by the other side, for the reason that in this case there was no interstate commerce involved; for, as I understand, a mere local canal was in question.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The question could not have arisen in that form, because almost all of this commerce is interstate commerce. It is the commerce passing up and down the Ohio River. There is not a vessel going through that canal that does not go through more than one State. The question did not seem to be pressed on either side as to whether it was a proper regulation of commerce. I only quote the authority of Mr. Justice Miller here upon the point squarely raised, that an attempt to regulate the tolls over that canal could not be enforced because it would be a disturbance of vested rights.

This leads me to speak of one other point that has arisen in this debate. It seems sometimes to be assumed in the discussion of this question, as in the discussion of some other questions on this floor, that the Congress of the United States can impair the obligation of a contract; that, for instance, if I happen to owe the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] who sits in front of me, $500, which I have by promissory note agreed to pay him in one year, Congress can pass a law declaring me free and exempt from that contract; and that he shall not afterward have the power to enforce the contract in a court of law. Now, Mr. Speaker, I suppose that if this doctrine has any authority whatever, it must rest on the idea that the Congress of the United States is not bound by the same rules of honesty, justice, honor, and uprightness that ought to govern any other legislative body. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that no prohibition on the passage of a law impairing the obligation of contracts or destroying vested rights is put in the Constitution, except in one of the amendments where it stands undoubtedly as a prohibition, providing that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. But I understand the courts have always held, when that question was presented squarely, that the Congress of the United States has no more power to impair the validity of a contract than a State Legislature has. They have held, to be sure, that where Congress, in the proper exercise of some power conferred upon it, has enacted a law that might in some remote degree impair the validity of a contract, such legislation would not for that reason be unconstitutional. But wherever the question has been presented, I have no doubt they have held, and would hold, as Mr. Justice Miller held in this case, that there is no power in Congress any more than in a State to divest the vested rights of individuals, except by giving just compensation therefor.

Mr. Speaker, I am arguing this case with reference to the rights of railroads, not because I like railroad management; for every instinct of my nature, every impulse of my being is on the side of the people in any controversy they may have with railroads. I will go as far as any man in any measure which can be shown to be safe and wise and constitutional, to put limitations upon these railroads. But, sir, supposing this bill is passed, what does it accomplish? It provides that these railroads shall charge only reasonable rates of freight. Now, how do these railroads exist? They come into operation, every one of them, (except the few that have been chartered under congressional authority,) by virtue of some State grant; and they have no rights or powers except those conferred upon them by that legislative enactment. A railroad chartered in Massachusetts cannot do any act except what the law creating it allows it to do. It cannot even engage in interstate commerce, unless its charter allows it to do so. It cannot carry a pound of freight out of the State nor bring a pound of freight into the State if the Legislature has prohibited it from doing so. It is an artificial person in every sense of the word. It has no existence whatever except the existence given to it by the State authority. The measure of its existence, its stature, its dimensions, its powers, are derived wholly from the State Legislature. You cannot by congressional enactment give it any power nor take from it any power. If at the outset, any powers granted to it were in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States, of course it could not exercise those powers, and the original grant would be void to that extent, but in all other respects its charter is the law and reason of its existence.

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman indulge me in one more question? I desire to ask him whether, in his opinion, a State can charter a company with the power to do business outside of the State—to run a steamboat, for instance, in carrying commerce from State to State in violation of the laws of Congress?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I agree with the gentleman entirely that the law of the State has no extraterritorial force. Whatever powers a corporation exercises outside of the limits of the State creating it, it exercises wholly by the consent of the State wherein it may exercise such powers. It does not exercise them by virtue of the original grant, or by virtue of the laws of the State creating it.

The point I make is that the power, the rights, and the duties of such corporations are created and defined by the State law, and cannot, therefore, be afterward defined or bounded or limited by any national legislation, without interfering not only with the right of the State to control and govern them, but with the right of the corporations to enjoy undisturbed the privileges which a State has given to them and has never withdrawn.

There cannot be any concurrent control. The State control excludes the Federal, as the Federal would, if exercised, exclude the State. And this regulation of rates of freight will thus take from these roads a right given to them absolutely by their charters, to contract with shippers upon such terms as may be agreed upon for the transportation of commodities; yet this right, as against the Federal Government, has become by all rules of law a vested right.

Besides, the power to fix a reasonable price involves the power to fix any price and compel compliance. It may be fixed so low as to destroy the value of the property, and yet there can be no redress.

Indeed it is no more beyond the power of Congress to say that railroads shall carry freight for nothing than it is beyond its power to make this bill a law, because the courts have frequently said, as they said in the case of the taxation of United States securities, if we grant the power at all we must grant it to the fullest extent; if we grant the power to regulate these freights at all, then the power resides in the Congress of the United States to regulate them absolutely, and they may fix them as low as they please, and then make it compulsory on the roads to carry freights at the price thus fixed. That is what this bill does. The bill says if the rates are fixed it shall in effect be a crime for any road to charge more; that if a railroad shall charge any more than these rates, or shall refuse to carry freights at these rates, such road shall be punished by exacting of it a heavy penalty. You have established the power in Congress, if this bill is held to be constitutional, not only to fix these rates arbitrarily at whatever it may see fit, but you provide a penalty for failure to abide by such schedule of rates.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to conclude his speech.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Now, sir, I wish to call the attention of the House to what Mr. Justice Strong says in the case of the State freight-tax, as that decision has been relied on as authority for the legislation here asked for. It was especially urged as a reason why the tax in that case was not unconstitutional that to hold it to be so would be to hold that a State could not tax the franchise of a corporation created by its legislation, nor even charge tolls upon any railroad or highway of which it might be the owner, as such tax or such tolls would be either immediately or remotely a tax upon interstate commerce.

Mr. Justice Strong held, however, distinctly that there was no power in Congress to regulate freights under the guise of a regulation of commerce. He says:

> That this argument rests upon a misconception of the statute is to our minds very evident. We concede the right and power of the State to tax the franchises of its corporations, and the rights of the owners of artificial highways, whether such owners be the State or grantees of franchises from the State, to exact what they please for the use of their ways.

Now, that is a plain declaration; and, so far as that case goes and is authority for anything, it is a concession that the question of freight charges is entirely beyond the control of Congress and cannot be enacted here as a regulation of commerce. The court say that the right to fix rates of freight is "an attribute of ownership," as it very clearly is.

Now, Mr. Speaker, so far as there are any authorities which touch this point at all, so far as the courts have given utterance to any opinions as to State regulation and congressional regulation on the subject of rates, we find they have invariably decided, as Mr. Justice Miller decided in the Louisville and Portland Canal case, and as was decided in the case to which I have just called the attention of the House, that the right to fix the price of freight is an attribute of ownership and not an attribute of sovereignty, and certainly is not included in the congressional power to regulate commerce.

Some one may say, how then can a State control freight charges? The State gets that right, not by reason of power to regulate commerce in the State at all, but it gets it by reason of its sovereignty and control over the thing in all of its aspects. It created and chartered the corporation, and of course it can regulate the corporation. It can put limits to it. It can appoint what it shall do and what it shall not do. The fact of the power does not rest on the right of the State to regulate commerce, but on its sovereign power over the artificial person existing only by virtue of its creative act, and which must therefore necessarily be subject to every regulation which it may see fit to make.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. If the charter has been granted without reservation of right to alter or control it, how does the gentleman get in the State Legislature the right to regulate rates which may result, as he has argued, in practically killing the charter?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. That difficulty has occurred, I suppose, to every gentleman who has considered this matter. It is a difficulty, it will be observed, that may be equally urged against congressional legislation.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I know that.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. And if, as against that objection, a State cannot regulate this, so neither can Congress. I am not ready to go the length to which some gentlemen go in holding that the Dartmouth College decision was broad enough to take from the State the control of rates of freight when it had given a charter without fixing particular rates. It appears to me that the sovereign power of the State, except so far as rights may have vested under a grant and which are technically called vested rights, cannot give away this control so as to put it out of the power of a subsequent Legislature. If the Legislature of Connecticut should grant a charter to a railroad—there having been no railroad in that State before—with a provision in the charter that the Legislature of the State would not at any subsequent time grant a charter to any other railroad in the State, it would follow, by the logic and authority by which some reach the conclusion based on the Dartmouth College case, that such a provision would bind all future Legislatures and prevent the State from granting a charter for another railroad? But I apprehend that no court would hold that any Legislature could bind its successors to that extent. And if a Legislature cannot do that, cannot bind its successors by such a provision, it seems to me very doubtful if they can bind them by simply neglecting to put in the grant a reservation of control over the charter. But I simply suggest this, and I should not feel bound after a further examination of the authorities to stand by it as a correct statement of the law. But this is true, I understand, of all the more recently chartered railroads; they have all, or nearly all of them, that reservation either in the charter itself, or the constitution of the State makes provision for it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Was not that question decided definitely by the Supreme Court in the Charles River and Warren Bridge case?

Mr. TREMAIN. That you could pass a subsequent act changing the charter?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That another bridge might be placed alongside of the former one.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. That case was for the moment out of my mind, and I am obliged to the gentleman from Massachusetts for calling my attention to it. It is a case where the Legislature considered that they had the power to authorize another bridge to be put alongside the one previously chartered, and the law was held valid.

But I must pass on from this view of the case, and I apologize to the House for occupying so much of its time; although I find that I have necessarily to pass over much that I had intended to say. I wish to get at another view of the question, which seems to me the more practical one. I understand most of the grievances of which complaint is made here do not have reference to through freight. For instance, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] in the speech he made on this question, and in which he arrayed statistics which are really very valuable in its discussion, stated as one grievance that the railroads of Iowa would not carry freights from the interior of that State to the Mississippi River—a transportation wholly within the State, the railroads of course being chartered by the State and being under State control—at the same rates per ton per mile as if shipped from Omaha or Davenport to New York City. And the gentleman insisted that we should regulate the rates here by congressional legislation; that we should provide that the railroads of the State of Iowa—railroads which are wholly within that State, subject to State control—shall carry freight from the interior of that State to the Mississippi River, there to be delivered to the steamers to be taken down the river, at the same rates per ton per mile for which they would carry them to New York City.

Now, such a regulation would be held unreasonable in the judgment of every gentleman present; but whether reasonable or unreasonable, it is a matter in the control of the State. I observe that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] shakes his head. I suppose he is thinking of the decision which was brought into this discussion in the Daniel Ball case, which was quoted by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BURROWS,] whom I do not now see in his seat; where the court held—though I doubt whether they would ever hold so again if the case were fully presented and argued before them—that any package started anywhere in the State and destined to a point out of the State, or brought from outside the State into the State, was interstate commerce, and was to be regulated by congressional legislation, and there could be no State control over it. Of course it cannot be regulated so far as putting any tax upon it by the State is concerned, or any prohibition as to its being brought into the State, or anything of that sort. But it occurs to me as a great stretch of the doctrine on the part of Mr. Justice Field in that case, when he said that a steamer running wholly within the State of Michigan, on the Grand River, and taking on board goods destined for a point outside the State, must have a license under the United States law. He had in a former part of the opinion said that the vessel must have a license, because the river was a navigable water of the United States. This being so, the other point did not need to be decided, as the United States statute, in terms, requires all vessels employed on navigable waters to have a license; and the dictum of the judge may therefore fairly be considered as out of the case.

But the point I make is this: the railroads, as I have already said, are the creatures of the States, and the State can fix the rates of freight if any power can fix them on those railroads. It can fix them just as much on freights going out of the State or brought into the State as on freights delivered from point to point in the State. It can, doubtless, prohibit a railroad from bringing freight into the State or taking freight out of the State. It certainly can say that whatever freight is taken up at any point shall be carried for so much per ton per mile over its road. In this respect it makes no difference that the line has been leased to foreign corporations, because the foreign corporations take no greater rights under such lease than are possessed by the company making the lease. I have no doubt the State can regulate rates on railroads in the State, provided such regulations do not conflict with a fair interpretation of the law as expounded in the Dartmouth College case. It can charter a corporation for a specific purpose, and it can limit that corporation in its work to that specific purpose; and having done so, the corporation has no right to violate that law, and if it does so, it forfeits its charter.

But in calling attention to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] I had in my mind also a suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think the gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. As I understood the gentleman from Iowa, he made the objection that the railroads of Iowa would not carry freights from the interior to the Mississippi River at the same rate per ton per mile as freights are carried from Omaha to New York City.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is not quite all. If the gentleman will allow me, I will explain what I did say.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The gentleman will excuse me now. If I have misapprehended his point, I certainly did not intend to do him injustice.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It will take me but a moment. The point I desired to make was that the discrimination in freight from the interior of the State to the river was so very great that nothing could stop at the river.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I meant to say that the gentleman complained of the charges from the interior of the State to the river. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] said that it cost as much to take up freight at Belvidere, his own home, and carry it to Chicago, seventy-five miles, as to take up similar freight at Omaha, four hundred miles away, and bring it through Belvidere and deliver it in Chicago. I have no doubt that is so; but it is a matter which the State of Illinois can regulate and has undertaken to regulate, although I understand that the regulation does not work to the satisfaction of any one but the railroad corporations.

Mr. FORT. They are not satisfied.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The people are certainly not satisfied whether the railroads are or are not. But the Chicago and Alton Railroad Company is making more money than ever before, and the people at competing points are complaining because they are charged more for freight now than they were formerly for the same distance, while there is no relief for those doing business at non-competing points.

Let me suggest another difficulty. There are several railroads that connect with railroads outside of the United States. The Vermont Central Railroad connects with the Grand Trunk Railroad. The Grand Trunk Railroad lies partly in Vermont and partly in New Hampshire, and partly in Maine, but it has the larger portion of its line in Canada, and then it connects with the Michigan Central Railroad at the other end. The New York Central Railroad connects with the Great Western Railroad and with other roads in Canada. Now, how are you going to regulate freights brought from Canada over those roads? How are you going to regulate freights carried from Chicago to Port Sarnia, and then over the Grand Trunk Railway to Rouse's Point, and then over the Vermont Central and other lines to Boston? Part of the line is entirely beyond your jurisdiction, and you cannot regulate the rate of freights in any way on that portion of the line. You may say that the Vermont Central Railroad shall not carry through freight and charge more than a certain amount per ton per mile; but that road is forced to make connection with a foreign corporation, over which you have no power, and concerning which you can say nothing. And yet it really derives a large portion of its business from that foreign railroad, or that which comes over the lakes by way of Ogdensburgh to Rouse's Point. Now, here you have a difficulty which is insurmountable. You cannot regulate the freights shipped in that way.

But what more? This bill in terms is applicable to through lines. I confess I do not quite understand the phraseology of the bill, or how far this matter of through lines is expected to reach. There are over four hundred railways in the United States, according to the latest statistics, and if you regulate through freights you have to regulate them upon every road. There may be a small road in Massachusetts, perhaps only five miles long, and yet it may take up freight to be delivered in San Francisco. A short piece of road in Vermont may take up freight to be delivered in New Orleans. How are you going to fix the rates of freight on that? By what measure will you estimate it? How can you fix the rates upon that little road which does not carry freight enough to pay running expenses, and which is built mainly for the purpose of developing the resources of some particular locality, the marble or slate interest of my State, or some manufacturing interest in some other State—how are you going to regulate its charges when it takes up a car of freight to be delivered a thousand miles away, part of which charge may be going to another road which may have a higher or a lower rate? It may have to be shipped over a dozen different roads before it gets to its destination, and the rates of freight to be fixed by this commission over those roads may not be alike on any two of them. Then how are you going to regulate rates on this little road, supposing you have the power? This only shows one of the difficulties which it seems to me must lead one to believe that the power does not exist.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. These rates are now fixed by the roads themselves. The bill provides, in the first place, that where the schedules are satisfactory from one point to another these commissioners need not interfere. They are not bound to establish schedules for every small or every large line in the country. In point of fact the rates of freight are now fixed by conventions of railroad superintendents, and made known to the public in all cases, as the gentleman knows. Why is it, then, more difficult for these nine commissioners, on an appeal, to give their schedule, than it is for the railroad officials to give theirs?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not understand that to be so, as a matter of fact. I do not understand that a little road in my State, which may only operate ten miles, is obliged to conform its rates to the schedule adopted by the New York Central Railroad.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. If the little railroad ten miles long takes freight at one end of its road and leaves it at another, and has no business arrangement with the long road, it does not come within this bill at all.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not know whether it comes in terms within this bill.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Allow me to finish the sentence, if you please. If it is doing business as part of a line from State to State, if it is in partnership with other roads which with it make up that line, then the line establishes and makes known to the public the rate of freight. This bill provides that any person interested may appeal to these commissioners; that the commissioners may revise the schedule, and then, not that the revised schedule is binding upon the road, but if anybody claims in court that the railroad is charging an unreasonable price, the fact that the price charged exceeds that of the schedule revised by the commissioners is prima facie evidence of unreasonableness, and the road must show that the schedule is wrong.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I understand that is the object of the bill; but I do not understand that the bill is limited to fixing rates of freight on what may be called through lines.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It is very careful in that particular.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. In point of fact if it does not reach through freights, whether taken up by short and independent lines or by those having through arrangements, it fails to reach the chief source of difficulty. If it does not affect local freights which are to be taken up to be delivered perhaps at the end of the line, then to be shipped to some other State, it does not remedy the evil complained of. For instance, in my State there is a short line of railroad connected with the marble and slate quarries. The complaint is that that short piece of road charges more than it ought to, and that if there was a competing line freight could be shipped cheaper than it can be now. That road does not connect with the New York Central road by a pro rata arrangement, nor with the Vermont Central, nor with the water-line; but it takes up freight at a stipulated price and carries it to the end of its line, and it is of its rates that complaint is made.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. To be delivered in Vermont?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not know whether it delivers its freight in Vermont or in some other State at the end of the line over which it has control.

I call attention now to another difficulty in bringing the prices for transportation of freights to any arbitrary standard.

I have here the fifth annual report of the railroad commissioners of Massachusetts, and I call the attention of members to the differences in the earnings and expenses of those roads. Mr. Adams reports that there are nineteen roads in Massachusetts, the average receipts of which are $14,000 per mile; the amount varying from $2,000 on the Duxbury and Cohasset road, to $36,000 on the Boston and Albany road; that the cost of operation amounts to $10,000 a mile on the average, the cost on some roads being much greater than on others; and the rates of freight varied from 1.01 cents per ton for long distances to one dollar per ton for short distances. Is it not apparent to any one who knows anything about railroads, where so many elements are to be taken into account and such widely different rates must be established, that you cannot fix these rates by any regulations that may be in the least uniform. You must take every one of the four hundred and sixteen roads in the United States and fix the freight on each one of them, and they will vary from one cent per ton to one dollar per ton per mile, as is seen in this statement of the Massachusetts roads; and he who supposes that any good to any one can come out of any such attempted regulation must have a much greater faith in the power of legislation than I have.

Most of these roads have been built for the purpose of developing the country; in many cases—as in my own State—by taxation on towns. A road has recently been put in operation in Vermont to which the town in which I reside gave $200,000, and we are now charged more than 1 per cent. as a tax each year to pay the interest on the bonds we issued to raise that money. The road does not now, and will not for years, pay any dividends on the stock for which we subscribed; and if it pays the interest on its mortgage-bonds, it will do better than I dare hope.

We should be glad of any legislation that will enable it to earn a fair interest on its cost; but I do not understand that the framers of this bill propose to make unprofitable roads profitable. Instead of that, they propose to make them less profitable than now, and put farther away the day when such roads as this, helped by my town, can make any returns to the stockholders whose hard-earned money has made it possible to build that public highway.

But that road has increased the value of property all along the line. The subscriptions made to it by many towns are supposed to be no more in amount than the benefit to those particular towns; and I suppose such has been the case. It has been running, and will run for years, not making a cent of dividend on the stock. It will probably never do so. The dividends, if it makes any at all, will be only payments of interest on the bonds; and it is not at all unlikely that in a few years it will fall into the hands of the bondholders. The case is the same, I venture to say, with the great majority of railroads in the country. No money put into investments within the last twenty years in this country has turned out so unprofitably for the investors as the money put into railroads; and no money invested anywhere has been so profitable to the country as the money invested in railroads. It has made the western country rich. It has filled it with population. Illinois is to-day where but for railroads it would not have been perhaps for twenty years to come. Railroads have brought every farm in that State within reach of a market. Thus the western country has been developed until it is now not only the granary of this country, but almost the granary of the world.

Of course, this is no excuse or justification for extortionate charges by the railroads. It is no excuse or justification for the fraud and corruption that have existed in the management of railroads. But it is a reason why men who have honestly put their money into railroads should at least have the same rights in legislation as men who have put their money into any other enterprise.

Now, Mr. Speaker, while apologizing to the House for detaining it so long, I desire to call attention to one other point with which I will close. It has been said once or twice in the course of this debate that since the war we ought not to hear anything in support of the "heresy of State rights;" that the war has in some way transformed this Government into a different government from what it was before. Sir, I am glad to know that the country is somewhat different from what it was before the war. I am glad to know that through reconstruction some substantial benefits have been produced. I am glad to know that the Federal Government, through that reconstruction, has more power to-day to protect the rights of citizens, to secure equal rights throughout the United States, than it had before the war. Yet I cannot understand how the power to regulate commerce has been in any way affected by this change. I am at a loss to understand how any provision of the Constitution that has not been modified by the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments, has been changed in the least, has had anything taken out of it or anything put into it, by reason of the war.

But I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, what the war has done and what those amendments have done. They have put more liberty into the Constitution of the United States and more freedom into this Government. What is liberty and what is freedom? Slavery was the power in a man or in a government to say what my work or your work should be worth, or whether we should have anything for it besides our food and clothing. Slavery was the power in a man or a government to make muscle its servant, at whatever price that government or that man might say it should work. Freedom means your right and my right and the right of every man to the free exercise of every power and faculty that has been bestowed upon us by nature; it means the right for me to work for any price which I choose to ask, whenever any one will pay me that price for my work.

Mr. Speaker, if the war has done anything, it has made the right of self-government dearer to the American people than it was before. It has made the right of the individual and of the local community more secure, established by surer guarantees, and hedged about by stronger muniments of title, than in the time when masters or governments could hold men as servants, and communities and races as unrepresented subjects, with no political, and with few, if any, personal rights.

Why, sir, look at the spectacle we have had within the last few weeks in Virginia. The democratic Legislature of that State were of the opinion that the city of Petersburgh was not properly governed by the people of that city; that the Legislature should regulate its government and should declare, not in terms, but by a cunning provision of law, that the colored men of that city should not exercise the right of suffrage in the local government. Governor Kemper, holding fast—and I honor him for so doing—to the traditions of his party in respect to local self-government——

Mr. COX. That is good democratic doctrine.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. That party does not always hold fast to the principle; but in this case Governor Kemper did so, and he vetoed the bill. He said that the city of Petersburgh should have local self-government, and that the colored people of that city should have a voice in the administration of its affairs, although his way in the attempt to secure it for them might be lighted with his burning effigies; and in that brave declaration the rights of the colored people of the South have a surer protection than any exercise of Federal power can give them.

Now, sir, if we have been taught any lesson in these times it is the lesson that local self-government is the best government for any people. We do not want any more measures of legislation brought here than are absolutely required to administer the Government as the Constitution has defined it, and thus to preserve the rights of the whole people as much by what we refrain from doing as by what we do. If the liberties and the equal rights of this country are to be preserved in the future, they are to be preserved by State and local self-government. What does Massachusetts know about the government that ought to exist in California? What does California know about how the school system of Massachusetts should be administered? Neither of them ought to intermeddle with the rights and duties of the other. Each of them should be at liberty to determine what its own method of government should be; how its own people should be ruled in their domestic affairs; how its own sovereignty should be carried on. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] in front of me said, when some discussion was had in the last Congress on the educational bill, that it was wiser to have thirty-seven States to settle these questions than to have one body like this to settle them, and, although he always speaks wisely, he never said a wiser thing than that. If you are going to bring the local affairs of all parts of the country, in all the thirty-seven States which we now have with the vast territory they cover, to be settled here mainly by men who know little of and care less for the effect of legislation upon remote localities, what chance is there that in nine cases out of ten injustice and wrong will not be done? What possible expectation can there be that the people of California can be aided in controlling the railroads of that State by the Congress of the United States? They have the power to do it themselves, and they have just shown that they know how to use that power; and there is no State in the Union less bold, less resolute, less able to solve this railroad problem for itself than California and Illinois and Iowa have shown themselves to be. In every aspect of the proposition, I believe that the control of these railroads should be left where it has always been, with the States.

But, sir, I cannot forbear saying, in passing, that I do not suppose the great railroads—those operated by Vanderbilt, or Jay Gould, or Tom Scott—will object to congressional control; certainly these railroad kings have given no sign of hostility to this measure, and they are not usually quiet when they consider themselves in danger. Controlling, as they do to-day, lines of railroads reaching into every State in the Union, they would be glad to be rid of State control and have but one legislative body to look after. But can any one who has seen what the power of money and the greed of money has accomplished in national legislation look without the most serious concern upon a proposition which makes it for the interest of the managers of the seventy thousand miles of railroad in this country to control the national administration? The railroads of the United States represent a capital of nearly $4,000,000,000, and by the use of money wield a tremendous power. Who wants to turn that power upon the Congress of the United States, and make it for the direct interest of the railroads to nominate Presidents, and name Cabinet officers and judges, and select members of Congress, and accomplish politically whatever the power of money will buy, or the fear of hostility will compel? Let him who would invite such a future for our national politics vote for this bill, and he will have taken a long step toward that result, a result more debauching and demoralizing to our politics than any invited or accomplished by any previous legislation in our history.

One word more, and I have done. If we inaugurate this species of legislation other measures become inevitable. We are attempting to fix prices. We are attempting to make contracts between parties abundantly able to make contracts for themselves. We are attempting to say what A shall receive from B for his services, and what B shall pay. Is it not plain to what this must lead? The railroad whose freight charges are fixed by law may rightfully demand that the price of what it has to buy shall be fixed by law. It will want cheaper iron. It will demand cheaper engines and cheaper cars. It will ask to be protected against strikes of engineers and employés, and for the aid of United States authorities to compel its workmen to receive and work for such wages as a congressional commission may fix. And if you fix the price of the laborer, then you must fix the price of the coat, of the boots, of the shirt which the laborer wears, and of the food with which he supports life. Will this stop anywhere short of the practices of governments which modern political writers of all schools have treated as evidence of a semi-civilized people, incapable of self-government and scarcely fit to be anything better than slaves—the governments which have everywhere given place to those giving freer play to all human faculties, and which have looked for man's highest development in the culture, in the greatest possible freedom of all human powers? A century or more ago this government control was a type of despotism, of absolute power, which could trust nothing to the people and did not believe in human progress. Now it is a type of a subtler and more dangerous political economy, which ends, if pursued, in communism, or the use by the Government of the property of the people for the benefit of what a majority may by vote decide to be for the general welfare. Every measure like this looks in that direction; and in the tendency of such legislation I think I see one of the greatest perils now threatening the future of the Government. Our safety lies in less faith in the machinery of government, and in greater self-reliance on the part of the people.

No man, said Disraeli, ever weakened government as Robert Peel; for he changed so much, people lost confidence in rulers, and were obliged to think for themselves. And hereafter the people of this country will, I trust, so far find their confidence in government machinery weakened by the constant exhibitions of its impotent efforts to save people from the consequences of their own mistakes and misconduct, that they will be willing to leave the Federal power to the exercise of its proper functions, and not attempt through it to hinder the working of economic laws as much beyond its control as are the laws of nature or the movements of the planetary system.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I had intended to make an argument on this question of transportation, which I regard as one of great magnitude and of the greatest importance to my people. The action of the House to-day in requiring a vote to-morrow prevents me from doing so; and as I am forced to go to Richmond to-night for one day on professional business, I ask the House to allow me to print my speech. (See Appendix.)

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The session this evening will be for debate only on the transportation bill, no business whatever to be transacted. The House will then take a further recess until ten o'clock to-morrow morning. Mr. SPRAGUE will occupy the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

And then, on motion of Mr. MCCRARY, (at five o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.,) the House took a recess until half-past seven.

EVENING SESSION.

The House assembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. SPRAGUE in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets to-night for debate only, and the bill (H. R. No. 1385) to regulate commerce by railroads in the several States is before the House.

[Mr. ATKINS addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. COTTON. The pending bill brings us to the important question whether Congress, under the power to regulate commerce among the several States, may regulate the charges of railroad corporations upon commerce of that character; whether a regulation of this kind is a regulation within the meaning of the Constitution.

The Constitution invests Congress with power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes."

Of the policy of intrusting this power with Congress, and of the importance of the same, Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, says:

> The want of this power was one of the leading defects of the Confederation, and probably, as much as any one cause, conduced to the establishment of the Constitution. It is a power vital to the prosperity of the Union, and without it the Government would scarcely deserve the name of a national Government, and would soon sink into discredit and imbecility. It would stand as a mere shadow of sovereignty, to mock our hopes and involve us in a common ruin.
> The oppressed and degraded state of commerce previous to the adoption of the Constitution can scarcely be forgotten. It was regulated by foreign nations with a single view to their own interests, and our disunited efforts to counteract their restrictions were rendered impotent by a want of combination. Congress, indeed, possessed the power of making treaties; but the inability of the Federal Government to enforce them had become so apparent as to render that power in a great degree useless. Those who felt the injury arising from this state of things, and those who were capable of estimating the influence of commerce on the prosperity of nations, perceived the necessity of giving the control over this important subject to a single government. It is not, therefore, matter of surprise that the grant should be as extensive as the mischief, and should comprehend all foreign commerce and all commerce among the States.

CONCESSION BY RAILROAD COMPANIES.

Is commerce upon railroads embraced within this power? That it is, railroad companies themselves virtually concede. When one of these corporations desires to construct a bridge across a navigable stream for the use of its road, it comes straightway to Congress, urges that Congress should give due recognition to commerce over its line, and asks that under this power permission be given for the building of the bridge, as was done by the act of July 25, 1866, which authorized the construction of eight bridges across the Mississippi River, and by the act of April 1, 1872, which gave permission for the construction of four bridges over the same stream. Whenever a controversy arises between one of these railroad companies, which has obtained the sanction of Congress to the erection of its bridge, and those interested in the navigation of a river, and it is urged against the maintenance of the bridge that the railroad is thereby obstructing navigation and commerce, the company responds that it, too, is engaged in commerce; that commerce upon a railroad is as important and as much entitled to congressional legislation for its promotion as commerce on a navigable stream, and that navigation must be made to suffer some inconvenience, in order that railroad companies may construct across these rivers their highways for commerce. In this position they have been sustained by the courts.

Railroad corporations have on their own behalf, and for their own benefit, obtained from Congress acknowledgment of the principle, that the operating of railroads is a means of commercial intercourse, as well as navigation, and entitled likewise to the consideration of Congress under its power to regulate commerce among the several States, and have thus conceded that railroads are subject to congressional regulation when they are engaged in interstate commerce.

I understand that those who oppose this bill do generally admit, as was done by the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. EDEN,] in his able speech on this subject, that the committee that reported this bill are correct in the proposition, that the "commerce among the several States" which may be regulated by Congress includes commerce carried from State to State by railroad; but they claim that within this power to regulate is not comprehended any supervision over tariff rates.

EXTENT OF POWER.

How far does this power to regulate extend? Is it limited simply to the establishment of what are termed police regulations, such as may be designed for the protection of the lives of passengers and to promote their comfort and to secure the proper care and transportation of freight, or does it also comprehend legislation in regard to charges? If it does not, the power is certainly very incomplete. These corporations, were they not amenable to such legislation, could greatly diminish or even destroy the commerce of certain localities by a system of discrimination and tolls which could be devised, and thus deny to a portion of the people those commercial facilities which it was intended under this provision of the Constitution should be fostered by Congress. The motive for engaging in commercial transactions is to make a profit. If those who operate these commercial highways are above all control in the matter of tariffs, they can make commerce over their roads profitable or unprofitable as they may choose, and can thus promote or retard commerce at their pleasure. The most important of all regulations is that affecting the cost of transportation. Grant to railroad corporations entire freedom in this regard, and they will regulate commerce, and all that will remain for Congress to do will be to direct how they shall equip and operate their trains, while by their tariff systems they will build up commerce at favorable points, and destroy it at others.

In the speech of the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. EDEN,] to which I have already referred, for the purpose of showing that it is absurd to claim for Congress this power, he remarks:

> Mr. Speaker, if the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States can be so construed as to include the right to fix the prices of freight, will not the same construction enable Congress to fix the prices of every commodity and of all the instruments used in such commerce?

And yet in the same speech we find the following:

> I take the position that it is competent for the States by law to fix reasonable maximum rates for freight and passenger tolls on all railroads within the States and constructed under their authority; and that freight and passengers transported over such roads and passing from one State to another may be required to pay the tolls so fixed by law.

May we not ask him whether he does not here admit what, on his assumption, will give each State Legislature the right to fix the price of every commodity transported over such roads, and of all the instruments used on those roads, and will result in a maze of legislation on all these subjects, with which the legislation he assumes Congress might exercise, under the construction given to the Constitution by the friends of this bill, would have no comparison in its complications and embarrassing effects?

But in the opinion in the case of the Reading Railroad Company vs. Pennsylvania (15 Wallace, 232) we find a complete refutation of the assumption that the authority in Congress to regulate charges would include the fixing of the prices of commodities and instruments used in commerce on railroads. In that case the court conceded that had the State tax, the validity of which was then involved, been imposed upon the company's franchise, or upon the property, which would include the instruments used in commerce, or upon its business measured by the number of tons carried, it would not have directly affected commerce over the road, and would have been valid notwithstanding the road formed part of a line for commerce among the States; but the tax being at certain rates on each two thousand pounds of freight carried for any distance on a railroad in the State of Pennsylvania, and being therefore a tax on transportation, it was decided that it was unconstitutional so far as it affected freight having a destination without the State.

SOURCE OF CHARTER IMMATERIAL.

It is claimed by some that the source from which a railroad corporation derives its charter determines the question whether it may be controlled by State legislation or national legislation; and a convention recently held in one of the States placed the following in its platform:

> That all corporations are subject to legislative control; that those created by Congress should be restricted and controlled by Congress; and that those under State laws should be subject to the control of the State creating them.

It might as well be proposed that the steamboats running on the Mississippi River above Saint Louis, and which are owned by corporations formed under State laws, are not subject to the navigation laws enacted by Congress, and that the State granting the charter to any of these corporations should prescribe the rules to govern the boats of such corporation in their passage from Saint Louis to Saint Paul.

An examination of the case in 15 Wallace will convince any one that there is no foundation for such division of authority as is thus asserted. The railroad company, which was a party in that case, is stated to be—

> A corporation created under the laws of Pennsylvania and engaged in the sole business of transporting freight for hire, and carrying no commodities of its own. An important part of its business is carrying coal from the mountains of Pennsylvania to a place called Port Richmond, near Philadelphia, a distance of about one hundred miles, the whole road being in Pennsylvania. A portion of the coal transported to Port Richmond is sold there to consumers, but by far the larger portion is intended for exportation beyond the limits of Pennsylvania, or is transferred at Port Richmond into vessels destined for such points. A considerable quantity of coal is also transferred by the railroad company to a point on the Schuykill Canal, where it is loaded into barges, and transported beyond the State.

The company was charged by the State with the following taxes: For freight transportation to points within the State of Pennsylvania, $38,361; for that exported to points without the State, $46,520. The latter sum the company refused to pay, and contended that the statute—

> To the extent that it imposed a tax on freight, other than that both received and delivered within the State of Pennsylvania, was unconstitutional and void, because, among other reasons, it was in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, which ordains that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.

In this position the company was sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the statute, to that extent, held unconstitutional.

Here was a railroad incorporated by and entirely within the State of Pennsylvania. If the fact that the charter was granted by that State gave the State control over the road, and excluded Congress, it would have been immaterial whether the tax on freight transported over this road and destined for points without the State did affect commerce between that and other States, as Congress could not interfere in the way of regulating commerce on this road. Yet the court adjudged the tax invalid so far as related to commerce between States, and at the same time stated in regard to the tax on commerce within that State that "doubtless a State may regulate its internal commerce as it pleases."

This case completely demolishes all these theories that the question between a State and Congress as to the power to control is to be determined from the nature of the company's charter, but makes it depend on the nature of the commerce to be regulated. If local and limited to the State, then only the State can regulate; but if of a national character, if among States, then national legislation alone can control.

How will the advocates of this doctrine, that the source of the charter is decisive of the right to control, get along with this decision, which recognizes two kinds of commerce on one railroad, and that, too, a railroad having a State charter; and that the State Legislature may control on this road the commerce which is carried on wholly within that State; while at the same time, and on the same road, Congress may regulate that commerce which extends beyond the territory of the State? The tax of $38,361 on freight transported within the State the railroad company paid without objection; and the court, in discussing this question, admitted that as to such freight the State could exact taxes in its discretion; but the tax of $46,520 on freight exported to points without the State was successfully resisted before the court, on the ground that the transportation of such freight was commerce among the States within the meaning of the Constitution, and Congress had the regulating of that, and the State could not lay thereon one penny of tax although this road had been built under a charter from that State.

If it be true that the right to regulate is to be ascertained from the company's charter, then all the commerce passing on the same road would be subject to State control if the charter should be from the State; but if from Congress, then to congressional regulation. But the Supreme Court of the United States think differently, and attach no importance whatever to the character of the road's charter, but place the right to control where the nature of the commerce may show it should be, and declare that Congress may regulate commerce on a road having a State charter, when the commerce is between that State and other States, and that the State shall, on the same road, exercise control of commerce limited to the territory of the State.

This decision permits to the State the making of all regulations bearing upon the commerce of the State, and maintains in Congress alone the right to regulate that commerce which also concerns other States, and settles absolutely the principle that it is the nature of the commerce, and not of the charter, which admits State control in the one case and congressional control in the other.

But few railroads or vessels engaged in commerce among the States, or with foreign nations, would be subject to regulation by Congress if the fact of being owned by a corporation having a State charter excluded control by Congress.

During this debate it has been mentioned that the railroads under State charters have had also in the construction of their roads the benefit of the State's right of eminent domain; and this is assigned as additional cause for claiming for the State supervision over the fares on these roads while carrying interstate commerce.

A State has sovereign jurisdiction over all the navigable waters within its borders; and, moreover, is the owner of the shores on navigable waters below high water; but this has never been thought to confer on the State power to establish rules for the navigation of these waters by vessels engaged in commerce among the States or with foreign nations.

STATE RIGHTS.

It is said we are invading State rights. What encroachment on the rights of a State is there in the regulating of a commerce that does not belong to the State? So far as the commerce on these roads appertains to the State, its power is recognized to the fullest extent. It has no more reason to claim the control of commerce from State to State passing through its territory on a railroad, than of that on a steamboat navigating its waters on a voyage between two neighboring States. The commerce which is to be affected by this bill is not that which belongs to any one State. Why should a State claim the control of that which is not its own, or be intrusted with such control?

The State can have no just ground of complaint that commerce which belongs to the citizens of many States is not placed under its guardianship, but under the care of the law-making power, which represents all concerned. Most of the commerce of this nature which passes through its territory over railroads is that in which not one of its citizens has any interest, unless it may be a resident stockholder in the road, and the stockholders, even, may be all non-residents. And why should the State wish commerce of this kind placed within its protection? Should it be that some of its citizens are interested in a part of this commerce, the citizens of other States are also concerned in the same; and the State should not seek to have control over that which would affect the interests of others in common with its own citizens.

Again, the State has the assurance that its citizens can have equal benefit with those of other States of any regulation Congress may establish. Thus it appears that instead of the principle contended for working injustice to any State or its citizens, it secures justice and equal legislation to all citizens of the United States who may be concerned in this commerce.

Next, can the railroad corporations complain? When they engage in this class of commerce, and with their trains pass the boundaries of States with the same freedom that they do those of a county or township, it is not for them to object to having applied to them that legislative control which is appropriate and alone adequate to regulate the business which they have undertaken.

The correct position, and that which will be affirmed by the courts when the question is made, is, that the National Legislature has cognizance of commerce which is national in its character, and a State Legislature of that within the State.

Congress was invested with authority to regulate commerce among the several States, that general regulations, and those which would apply alike to all the States, might be provided; the partial, limited, and conflicting legislation of the separate States being inadequate. There is the same reason for having uniformity of legislation in the matter of fares that there is upon any other subject touching this commerce. It is impossible to separate a regulation of this nature from those which Congress, under the Constitution, may enact, and assign this to the domain of State power, and exclude it from congressional.

NO MIXED POWER.

Whatever may be done in regulating commerce of this nature must be done by Congress. Neither the Constitution nor the decisions of the Supreme Court recognize any mixed authority. The principle settled in the Pennsylvania freight-tax case will not admit of a partial control by Congress to be supplemented by the States—Congress to take charge of all but tolls, and the States to establish them. Concurrent power is not permitted, but a clear division is made giving all to the State over State commerce, and all to Congress over national commerce.

I cannot understand how any regulation affecting tolls can be said not to be a regulation, or by what name it can be characterized so as to exclude it from the regulations Congress can create.

If railroads engaged in commerce among the States are not subject to regulation by Congress in respect to tariffs, they are exempt from all supervision in that regard, and those gentlemen who contend that Congress cannot legislate so as to require reasonable rates are taking a position which would place these roads above all control in this respect.

On this point I cite the following from Story on the Constitution:

> The next inquiry is, whether this power to regulate commerce is exclusive of the same power in the States, or is concurrent with it. It has been settled, upon the most solemn deliberation, that the power is exclusive in the Government of the United States. The reasoning upon which this doctrine is founded is to the following effect: The power to regulate commerce is general and unlimited in its terms. The full power to regulate a particular subject implies the whole power, and leaves no residuum. A grant of the whole is incompatible with the existence of a right in another to any part of it. A grant of a power to regulate, necessarily excludes the action of all others who would perform the same operation on the same thing. Regulation is designed to indicate the entire result, applying to those parts which remain as they were as well as to those which are altered. It produces a uniform whole, which is as much disturbed and deranged by changing what the regulating power designs to have unbounded as that on which it has operated.

According to this authority, when a railroad constitutes a line of commerce among States so as to be subject to regulation by Congress, State authority is excluded, and regulations concerning tariff rates must be made by Congress, or not at all. If gentlemen, therefore, can succeed in maintaining the position that Congress has no power over tariffs on these railroads, they will have shown that there cannot be any legislative supervision over these tariffs.

POWER COMPLETE.

Under the construction given by Story to this provision of the Constitution, that the power to regulate is general and unlimited in its terms, that the full power to regulate a particular subject implies the whole power, how can it be made to appear that there is an incompleteness in this power; that there are abuses, unjust discriminations, and extortionate rates of toll which Congress is impotent to correct? Who can establish the line, and say that Congress may go just so far and no farther in prescribing regulations; that it may be enacted that passengers shall have suitable cars and ample room while journeying over these roads, but that there is no power to declare that extortion shall not be practiced on them during their journey; that freight shall be forwarded with reasonable dispatch and due care, but that there can be no inhibition to prevent a large portion of the value of that freight from being appropriated by the railroad company while it is in transit. Commerce includes the transportation of passengers. (Smith vs. Turner, and Norris vs. The City of Boston, 7 Howard, 283.)

In the case in 15 Howard it is said:

> The rule has been asserted with great clearness that whenever the subjects over which a power to regulate commerce is asserted are in their nature national, or admit of one uniform system or plan of regulation, they may justly be said to be of such a nature as to require exclusive legislation by Congress. Surely transportation of passengers or merchandise through a State, or from one State to another, is of this nature. It is of national importance that over that subject there should be but one regulating power, for if one State can directly tax persons or property passing through it, or tax them indirectly, by levying a tax upon their transportation, every other may, and thus commercial intercourse between States remote from each other may be destroyed. The produce of Western States may thus be effectually excluded from eastern markets, for though it might bear the imposition of a single tax it would be crushed under the load of many. It was to guard against this possibility of such commercial embarrassments, no doubt, that the power of regulating commerce among the States was conferred upon the Federal Government.

The uniform system which is here stated to be so desirable could be defeated if Congress has not the power to prevent railroads, even with the sanction of State Legislatures, from establishing discriminating rates. A State could legalize rates which would be to the advantage of its own towns and citizens, and to the disadvantage of those who would have occasion to make shipments through the States.

All the evils to result from taxation by each State of commerce in transit on its roads would be caused by the several States exercising the power to fix the charges on this commerce.

STATES CANNOT ABRIDGE.

This power cannot be abridged by reason of anything in the State charters to these corporations. Under the authority to regulate commerce an act was passed by Congress legalizing the Wheeling bridge. The validity of this act was drawn in question in the case of The State of Pennsylvania vs. Wheeling and Belmont Bridge Company, reported in 18 Howard, 421, from the opinions in which case I extract the following:

It is also urged that this act of Congress is void for the reason that it is inconsistent with the compact between the States of Virginia and Kentucky at the time of the admission of the latter into the Union, by which it was agreed that the use and navigation of the river Ohio, so far as the territory of the proposed State, or the territory that shall remain within the limits of this Commonwealth (Virginia) lies thereon, shall be free and common to the citizens of the United States, and which compact was assented to by Congress at the time of the admission of the State. This court held, in the case of Green et al. vs. Biddle, (2 Wheaton, 1,) that an act of the Legislature of Kentucky in contravention of this compact was null and void within the provision of the Constitution forbidding a State to pass any law impairing the obligation of a contract. But that is not the question here. The question here is whether or not the compact can operate as a restriction upon the power of Congress under the Constitution to regulate commerce among the several States. Clearly not. Otherwise Congress and two States would possess the power to modify and alter the Constitution itself.

The import of this decision is that States cannot by any compact they may make, even when that compact has been assented to by Congress, impair this constitutional right to regulate commerce.

The purpose for which railroad corporations are formed, and the manner in which their affairs are conducted, make it apparent that there should be legislative supervision over their charges. The stockholders in a corporation, who in their individual business transactions are most honorable and fair, cannot impart to the corporation their personal characteristics. Their connection with it consists in owning stock, receiving what dividends may be allotted to them, and participating in the election of officers. The larger the dividends the more highly the stock is valued. They look upon the corporation simply as an organization to make the most money practicable. On the other hand, the officers may be very just and good men personally, but they are employed to devote their energies to securing the highest possible receipts, and the more earnings they can report the more highly they are appreciated and rewarded. As the result of this relation of the stockholders and officers to the corporation, the corporation itself becomes an exceedingly avaricious and selfish institution.

There are some seventy-one thousand miles of railroad constructed in the United States, costing $3,000,000,000—one-tenth of the estimated value of all the real and personal property in this country in the year 1870; and this immense capital is managed by a power which feels no restraint in its rapacity for money-getting other than that which the law can impose.

Most individuals possessing wealth feel a moral accountability in its management which restrains them from oppressing their fellows. Their sympathies may be appealed to; and they are always desirous that by just and fair dealing they may secure public approbation. Should a man of wealth prove to be sordid and oppressive, it is known that he cannot always continue his extortions, and that his possessions must pass into other, and it is hoped better hands. But in the case of these corporations, devoid of conscience or sympathy, and which care for public opinion only so far as it may affect their profits, their power is to continue and increase perpetually.

Railroad corporations are, from their relation to the public, peculiarly subject to legislative control. They profess to be engaged in a public work. They are permitted to take the land of the citizen, on making compensation, on the ground that therewith they are to serve the public. Occupying this position in securing their right of way, they must abide by the same in using the land thus obtained, and as public servants be subject to regulation in the interest of the public; and it is incumbent on them to make their charges as moderate and as impartial to every citizen as they would be on a railroad built and operated by a State or by the United States. So long as they limit their business to commerce within a State, they are entirely subject to State authority, and it is the province of the State, to see that they properly exercise the public trust confided to them; but when their operations are extended to interstate commerce, they bring themselves within congressional supervision.

Congress is now called upon to apply to commerce on railroads the same power it has exercised in respect to commerce on navigable waters. While no law has been passed which directly related to charges for transportation on vessels, yet the laws which have required the expenditure of money in providing for the safety and comfort of passengers have affected the revenues of the owners of these vessels. There being opportunity for competition between vessels from all points and on all lines, it has not appeared necessary to legislate in relation to their charges. But there cannot be competition at most of the points on railroads, they being accessible only to the cars of one company, and this renders legislation of this nature in respect to railroads important. Can it be doubted that the most essential of all regulations, that which affects the very life of commerce—the profit to be derived therefrom—is comprehended in the general power to regulate commerce among the several States, and that as to railroads engaged in such commerce Congress may prescribe regulations prohibiting excessive charges?

COMMITTEE'S BILL.

I propose now to speak for a few minutes of the details of the bill before the House, having already spoken upon the general merits of the proposition brought before us by the Committee on Railways and Canals. I will state the leading features of the bill.

It provides that railroads employed in commerce among the several States shall not charge nor receive more than a fair and reasonable rate of toll or compensation for transportation of freight of any kind or of passengers, or for the transportation of cars on their tracks.

It provides further that there shall be a board of nine commissioners, consisting of one from each judicial circuit of the United States; that the board shall institute a thorough investigation into the rates of toll and compensation charged for transportation of freights, passengers, and cars over each of said lines of railroad, and into the reasonableness thereof, and shall, as soon as practicable after such investigation, prepare for the owners and operators of each of such lines a separate schedule of reasonable maximum rates of charges, the schedule to be duly authenticated by said board of commissioners, printed, and posted in each of the offices and depots of such railroad company. A copy is to be filed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court of the circuit in which may be any part of the railroad affected by the schedule, and a copy of the schedule, certified by the clerk of the court, is to be admissible in evidence in any trial under this law. Where the commissioners find the rates of a company already reasonable, they may dispense with fixing a tariff of charges for that company. Any corporation operating a line of railroad through two or more States, which shall, after such schedule takes effect, (which is to be thirty days after it is thus filed,) be guilty of extortion, by charging or receiving more than a reasonable rate of toll or compensation for the transportation of freight, passengers, or cars over such line, shall pay a certain penalty. It is made the duty of the United States attorneys to prosecute all such offenses. The company is also made liable to the party injured for damages caused by reason of overcharge. Upon any trial for violation of the law the schedule is to be received as prima facie evidence that the charges therein fixed are reasonable; yet the company is permitted to prove the fact of their being reasonable, and show that the charges, although exceeding the schedule rates, are nevertheless reasonable.

These commissioners are authorized to gather information and statistics upon the subject of railroads both in this country and in foreign countries, and to make recommendation in reference to further legislation.

These are the leading features of the bill. This is the first step in legislation of this character, the first attempt on the part of Congress to supervise the charges of railroad corporations. The bill gives evidence of being framed with great care, and follows the legislation which those States that have undertaken to supervise railroad tariffs have found to be the most practicable and expedient, and the most beneficial to the public as well as just to the railroads.

I have here the decision of the Illinois supreme court, delivered during the past year, in the case of The Chicago and Alton Railroad Company vs. The People ex relatione Koerner and others, railroad and warehouse commissioners of Illinois. That was a proceeding to annul the charter of the corporation.

The new constitution adopted not long since in Illinois provides that—

The General Assembly shall pass laws to correct abuses and prevent unjust discrimination and extortion in the rate of freight and passenger tariffs on the different roads in this State, and enforce such laws by adequate penalties, to the extent, if necessary for that purpose, of forfeiture of their property and franchises. (Article 11, section 15.)

The Legislature passed a law, the first section of which declares that—

No railroad company in this State shall charge a larger compensation for the transportation of freight over any distance than it is charging at the same time, for freight of the same class, over a less distance, nor shall it charge the same amount that it charges over a less distance.

Another clause of the same section reads that—

No railroad company in this State shall charge a larger compensation for freight over any portion of its road than is charged for freight of the same class over any other portion of equal length.

The statute, as penalty for disregarding these regulations, declares that the franchise of the offending corporation should be forfeited.

It will be seen that the constitution gave the Legislature the authority to prevent unjust discrimination. But the court held this law to be unconstitutional, because it established an arbitrary rule against any discrimination. The complaint in that case was that the company had repeatedly charged and received for transporting lumber from Chicago to Lexington, a distance of one hundred and ten miles, the sum of $5.65 per one thousand feet, while at the same time it had only charged for transportation of like lumber from Chicago to Bloomington, a distance of one hundred and twenty-six miles, the sum of five dollars per one thousand feet.

The court say that the inflexible rule established by the statute was not legislation against unjust discrimination, and say:

That the naked fact that a railway company charges a larger sum for transporting freight of the same class over a given distance than it is charging for the same distance over another part of its road, or in the opposite direction, is not of itself conclusive evidence of an unjust discrimination, will be manifest on a moment's consideration. Take, for instance, the road of the appellant, with one terminus at Chicago and the other at East Saint Louis. At one season of the year more freights are moving from Chicago toward East Saint Louis than in the opposite direction. The consequence, of course, is that the supply of empty cars at the latter point will be in excess of the demand. There is a water-route between these points which also touches several intermediate stations upon the road. Now, unless the railway company is permitted, under such circumstances, to induce shipments over its lines by lowering its freights, it is evident that a portion of its cars will return empty. This would, of course, necessitate a higher charge for freight moving toward Saint Louis than it would be necessary to impose if return freights could be secured by lowering the rates on the return trip. To forbid the company to lower the rates of return freights would thus benefit no one, and would work an injury both to the company and to the people along the line. At other seasons of the year the larger amount of freight is moving in the opposite direction, and the operation must be reversed.

We give this illustration for the purpose of showing that a difference of price, for the same distance of transportation, is not necessarily an unjust discrimination, and that law must be fatally defective which infers guilt as conclusive presumption from the mere fact of difference of rates without permission to explain.

That court thus recognizing the fact that a company may make different charges on the same road and for the same distance under certain circumstances.

They say the shippers on the road are benefited by such discrimination, because it enables the company, by offering inducements to have its cars filled when they would otherwise be running empty, to carry freight for them at a less rate. From this decision it appears that the policy of the present bill, which is to leave a discretion with the commissioners to determine what may be reasonable rates under the different circumstances, is the correct policy; and that a fixed rule that the company must charge the same rate upon every part of its road for the same freight, is not in all cases reasonable.

We have some bills before this House of this inflexible-rate character which it is proposed to move as amendments to this bill. Those bills undertake to limit railroads to a uniform rate for the same distance on every part of their lines, which, as shown by this decision, would be an unreasonable proposition.

The bill of the committee inaugurates congressional legislation on this question by not too arbitrary legislation, applying the remedy at the start with moderation, and providing for nine commissioners to ascertain and prescribe what may seem to be fair schedules of charges. While the efficiency and policy of this law are being tested, they are to gather information and present it to Congress to furnish data for better legislation if possible in the future. I shall vote for this bill as it stands.

Mr. WHITEHEAD obtained the floor, and said: I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE.]

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Speaker, no graver question has ever agitated the councils of the nation than the one presented in the consideration of the present bill. The laboring masses of the country rightfully have conceived that the fruits of their industry are being controlled and tithed with unjust tribute to classes who have been favored in the grant of special privileges by the legislation of the Government. It is proposed by the authors of the present bill to redress this grievance by the methods suggested in the bill. What are the methods of relief proposed? Stated in brief, they are, that the President of the United States shall appoint a commission of nine persons, whose duty it shall be to adopt and fix rates of transportation to be charged by all railroads engaged in interstate commerce, and may from time to time change and revise any schedule of rates they may adopt. These officers are subject to removal by the President, and the only qualification required of them is that they shall be residents of the different judicial circuits of the United States, and be disinterested. Any charge of rates beyond those fixed by the commission is declared unlawful, and punished by fine, &c., unless the railroad company can affirmatively show that the charge is reasonable. This commission is to be continued as a bureau of railroad statistics, with a secretary. All these are salaried officers.

An examination of the bill shows that it is claimed by its authors that an agency or party distinct from the shipper and the carrier may intervene to regulate the terms of the contract of shipment between them. It is alleged that the right and authority to do so is derived from the power expressly conferred upon Congress by section 8, article 1, of the Constitution, which is granted in these words:

To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

I adopt here the words of the report of the majority of the committee, when I say that "in considering the question whether under this provision Congress has power to pass the bill reported, it will be necessary to inquire as to the nature and extent of the power conferred thereby upon Congress." In so doing I do not care to examine the judicial decisions; they have been ably dissected and canvassed by my learned friends from Kentucky [Mr. ARTHUR] and from Illinois, [Mr. EDEN.] It is sufficient to say that the precise question has not been raised before, or decided by the courts. The nature and extent of this power is, then, an open question before the people and the courts.

Looking to the history of the adoption of this grant of power, and to the circumstances that made it necessary, as well as the practice and legislation of the Government since its formation down to the present time, none of which is it pretended shows that such an exercise of it as is claimed by this bill was ever attempted or submitted for action, it would seem that we would be warranted in giving as the true construction and meaning of these words, "to regulate commerce among the States," the accepted one heretofore, that is, that it was intended to secure "free commerce" among the States, and that Congress was invested alone with the power to remove any obstruction or impediment thereto. But it is said that the extension and multiplication of railroads and their uses in the carrying trade, and especially among the States, has made the exercise of this power necessary, and that the grant is express in its terms.

Does the power to regulate mean the power to control, to give life or death? Does the power to regulate mean that you may appropriate the service or property of the citizen to the uses and interest of the public without direct compensation to him? And by arbitrarily determining the value of his time, the use of his property, and his labor, without his consent, do you not appropriate it to the public? Again, is the power "to regulate commerce among the States" any more comprehensive than the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations?" Are not the same terms used in the same grant of power? Yet who will argue that we may create a commission to establish, and then from time to time revise and alter the schedule of rates to be charged by domestic vessels engaged in foreign commerce, or foreign vessels engaged in the like trade? Such a board would perform the office of a Chinese wall. But, sir, turning for a moment to the arguments made by the supporters of this bill, and adopting the liberal and latitudinarian construction they have used, it would seem that the nature and extent of this power is boundless, and may embrace not only the common carriers by rail, but the common carrier by the road-wagon, by the transfer-wagon, by the omnibus, by the coach, by the dray, by the truck, by the pack-horse, and by the wheelbarrow. It may extend to the vehicle or instrument, and may include the warehouse and the depot, and far beyond that, the barn, the crib, and the field.

One cannot contemplate these assumptions of power in the General Government without serious apprehensions as to the fate of all our local jurisdiction, and the freedom of individual action; and the mere confrontment of the results you must reach upon the exercise of such power must show that such "nature and extent" thereof was never contemplated by the founders of our Government.

And, Mr. Speaker, while it must be admitted that the railroads of this country have been favored by partial legislation, that they enjoy vast privileges, and that in the exercise of them many unjust discriminations, partialities, and combinations, onerous, exacting, and extortionate upon the trade and commerce of the country, are made, that instead or serving the sovereignties that created them, they are lording it over them; and that instead of using the privileges conferred upon them for the public good, they, in the interest of classes and sections, are making war upon it whereby millions of tribute are unjustly taken from the producers, yet heeding the reply of these railroads and putting the matter in a point of view where their defense is justly weighed, and let it be granted that the cost of construction, the cost of maintenance, the cost of service has been and is such that it is not possible, in justice to them, to make any material reduction in the transportation of the products of the country, what is the remedy? Will a commission fix less ratio? Will Congress? Will the President? If the railroad companies are right and rates are fixed less, if the power of self-protection is taken away from them, is not the whole system threatened? Could the country afford to abandon the railroads? Think for a moment of the number of miles of railroads, the vast extent of territory, and the number of people dependent upon their facilities; how they are interlaced and interwoven with all the industries of your cities, towns, villages, and farms, and then suppose them blotted out of existence; or reflect again, and ask whether the labor of forty millions of people represented from the largest manufacturing establishment in your mammoth cities to the smallest workshop in some remote village; from the wheat-field of the North and the corn-field of the West to the rice, sugar, and cotton plantations of the South, should be made dependent not upon the health of vigorous competition, not upon the thrift of energy, not upon the life of activity, not upon the freedom of thought and action of the individuals most interested, nor yet upon the judgment and observations of local Legislatures and courts, but upon the knowledge, judgment, passion, prejudice, and it may be interests, of nine men who are not an ointed by God for the work, but selected by one who is human like unto themselves.

Does not the surrender of this control of all that may appertain or be construed to appertain to the commerce between the States mean the abandonment of the great principles upon which republican government is based—"the capacity of the people for self-government?" Our national life, the prosperity of the States, the wealth, comfort, and support of the citizens, are dependent upon commerce. Shall all these high interests be placed in the hands of one man, who, by the selection of the instruments of his will, may have autocratic control, and so may pervert them to their destruction? Great and serious are the evils which now, by vast and powerful railroad combinations, obstruct the freedom of commerce between the States; but, sir, can any evil be so serious and so great as to demand the surrender of the popular liberties, so serious and so great as to require that you shall depart from the faith upon which your Government was based? Is it not better "to bear those ills we have than fly to others that we know not of?" Shall we escape from one monopoly to become the victims of another? What security have the people that after the adoption of this bill, and the powers asserted under it, those who will exercise the trust thus delegated to them are not or will not be in alliance with the monopolies and the rings against whom they now so vigorously protest? What security have the people that the party which built up those gigantic monopolies by largesses in money and by empires of land, who have robbed the landless of their inheritance to enrich corporations, will not continue in the work of despoliation? Is it not a high abuse of our trusts to relegate the powers placed in our hands by the people to others, and these in no way responsible to them? Can we legally and constitutionally delegate our authority? It is alone given to us, with no right of substitution.

Turning for a moment to the actual condition of the country, we are struck with the growth of corporations in this century. Especially in this country have their number and progress been rapid, and include within their grasp almost every living industry and interest. That they have accomplished much good, I will not gainsay. It is equally true that much of evil, of fraud, of wrong and oppression, has followed in their train, and their tendency is fruitful of more, and in their effort to secure power over the industry, the trade, and the currency of the country threaten it with an Iliad of woes. How can individual labor and enterprise, personal effort and industry, be expected to thrive and prosper when associated capital and labor is protected from the hazards of responsibility by corporate charters? Privileges and exemptions denied to individual capital and labor are granted and secured to corporate capital and labor. The race is unequal.

It was against such monopolies and privileges that the origin and forms of our governments were a protest. By American constitutions the largest liberty to the individual, consistent with the rights of others, was intended to be secured. No privileged class, no monopolies, no perpetuities, but the coequal sovereignty of the citizen, are the underlying principles of American liberty. Monopoly in land was stricken down. Shall it be said that monopoly in personal property and privileges is to be perpetuated under the sanction of our laws? It is a libel upon the spirit and theory of our institutions to so claim.

Sir, I am not prepared to concede that in a representative form of government, whose legislative bodies are but the agents of the people, the granting of franchises and privileges is a contract; but conceding such an act is, I submit that it is a sound principle in law and in morals that an agent cannot exceed his authority, and that he who contracts with a known agent must take notice of the extent of his authority. The agency or trust of the legislator is one to be exercised alone for the interest and welfare of the public. No right or power is granted to any representative under our American constitutions to create monopolies, to confer privileges and immunities over, above, beyond, or inconsistent with the public good and the public welfare; none whatever.

Sir, when we turn yet again to the condition of the country and behold the gigantic strides it has made in increase of population, in the multiplication of manufactures, in the tremendous increase of agricultural productions, and that the annual value of these productions—agricultural, I mean—are estimated at over three billion dollars, and realizing the necessity of cheap transportation, as well in the sale as in the purchase of the conveniences and necessaries of life, involved in the exchange of this immense amount of values and the supply of this large population, and knowing as we do the magnitude of the exactions levied by the carriers upon this work of exchange, especially by those carriers who are shielded in their exactions by corporate charters, we must recognize that the question under consideration is one of the deepest importance and gravest in consequences, not only to parties, but to the very life of the nation itself.

By the political faith of my life, by the humble record I have made as a public servant, as well as by my sense of the justice and truth of the complaints made by the people, I am cordially in sympathy with their earnest protest against the exactions, the extortions, and encroachments of the monster corporations of the country. But the bill under consideration fails to give relief, is fraught with more danger than existing evils, and is liable to the grave suspicion that it may be prostituted by the very agents it professedly seeks to control.

Another remedy has been suggested, and that is that the Government shall build by its money and credit various railroads and canals, the estimated cost of the most prominent being $300,000,000, the real cost of which, judging by the experience of our national and State governments in similar public enterprises, it is entirely safe to estimate will be nearer a billion dollars. Launch the Government into the experiment of building those already suggested, and there will come an irresistible demand from every section of the country to build other roads and other canals, which you are compelled to heed, or else gross injustice will be done; and the end no man can foretell. Build them to any extent, and you place the Government in competition with its citizens, and you confer the appointment of a horde of agents and employés upon the commander of your Army and Navy, and whose army of civil officers now aggregates in numbers by the thousand. Can this state of things exist in harmony with the character of your Government as founded by its fathers? Sir, it seems that the mere statement of the probable cost of such improvements, the cost of sustaining them in repair and in the employment of agents to operate them, with the knowledge by the people of the inevitable and inseparable corruption and extravagance that seem naturally to attach to all associations of Government with public works, together with the too certain increase of taxation, is sufficient to condemn these propositions.

Akin to these is yet another suggested remedy, now but remotely hinted at, but yet the one most to be apprehended; that is, that the Government shall take, hold, and use the roads already in existence.

In all this struggle, Mr. Speaker, the real contest is one between capital and labor. Under our institutions feudal rights have been abolished. Estates are not held for centuries. Lords, princes, dukes, and barons are not born to inheritances saved to them without labor. The theory of our institutions is supposed to be in conformity to the injunction of God, that by the sweat of your face you shall earn your bread. Unhappily there is with all of us an effort to avoid this injunction, and no better method of avoiding it has been discovered in this country than by the investment of capital in bonds. The bondholder neither toils nor labors, and it is to the perpetuity of debt that he looks for perpetuity in estate, and whatever may tend to increase the debt or prolong its existence finds in him an advocate.

The railroad debt of the United States, as stated by the Railway Monitor, amounts to $3,723,416,000—over three billion dollars! Now, if this amount could be added to the present indebtedness of the United States the idea of its payment would be hopeless, and the bondholder, and the bondholder's wealth, taxation, would become permanent institutions.

I have feared that the just complaints of the people against the exactions and extortions of the railroads would be added to by these persons, with a view of ultimately directing the attention of the laboring and producing masses to the purchase of the railroad as the only solution of the transportation problem, in the hope that, when maddened by the tyranny and oppression of these corporations, a majority of the people, without due reflection as to all the consequences, would accept the proposition. Is there any ground for this apprehension? I have not seen and examined the report of the railroad commission appointed by the English Parliament, in which this matter is discussed, but learn from those who have, that they report that in England the only solution to this vexed question is either free competition or the purchase by the government of the railroads. The railroad commissioners of Massachusetts have advised substantially the purchase of leading railroads in that State, and recently, in the transportation convention that assembled in this city, this idea was advanced by a leading member and a prominent statesman in the country. Looking to the vast interest represented by the capital and bondholders of these railroads; looking to the motives that control men, and paying due regard to the tendencies of the times, and the difficulties that inhere to the question, may it not be apprehended there is danger that, if we enter upon this commission, its mission may end in the same conclusion, that the Government must own the railroads in order to furnish cheap transportation to the people?

United by every feeling of my nature, and by a political faith derived from the teachings of Mr. Jefferson, to the agricultural interests of the country, and believing that they are the truest and most unselfish guardians of popular liberty and democratic institutions, and recognizing their complaints to be just, I, as a friend, entreat them to watch closely the efforts being made to take control of their wealth and their labor by either of the modes suggested.

Popular liberty is lost when the citizen becomes a creature of the Government. Freedom in the person is not consistent with dependence upon or the guardianship of the ruler.

Since, then, expedients will not do, the question recurs, in face of admitted abuses and evils, are there no constitutional and appropriate remedies? In my opinion there are; and,

First. In this admitted power of Congress to regulate commerce, not by interfering with the right of the citizen to contract as he may please, but in punishing by appropriate fines and penalties all combinations, trade regulations, ordinances, or rates which interfere with or obstruct the freedom of commerce, whether adopted by States, corporations, or individuals.

Secondly. By the improvement of such rivers and lakes as are national in their character.

Thirdly. By the direct interference and control of the States over such charters as are being abused to the prejudice of the public welfare. In other words, the exercise of the local sovereignty from whom their powers are derived.

But beyond and superior to all these is the fourth remedy, and that is that the taxes, which rest upon the labor and productions of the country, shall be diminished. What are these? Nominally they are, for national, State, and municipal purposes, about $700,000,000; really they are about $1,000,000,000.

It is estimated by gentlemen who have given close attention to the principles and working of a protective tariff that the consumers under our existing laws pay nearly as much into the pockets of the protected classes as passes into the public Treasury. This must be nearly the amount the consumer loses, or rather is taxed, since he has to pay the bounty exacted by protection and manufacture, and then on the expenses and profits of the middlemen. Again, I am persuaded that under the monopoly that exists in the currency the laborers and producers of this country are taxed in the support of excessive interest, and in the difference that exists between the currency they sell for and the currency with which they buy, many million dollars.

It is your monopolies in the tariff and in the currency, added to the expenses of your national and local governments, that create the great body of the evils of which the producers of the country complain. Let there be reform in your currency, and control your tariff and tax laws in the interest alone of revenue. Give freedom to commerce, retrench the expenses of Government, and the burdens of which the farmers and laborers of the country complain will become lighter. Transportation will, by such assistance as you may legitimately give it, and left to the wholesome laws of individual energy and competition, adapt itself to the economy of your legislation, and become cheap—responsive to the demands of the people.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I know full well that no subject has attracted the attention of the agriculturists of this land so much and so often in the last few years as this subject of cheap transportation. I am aware, sir, that the great agricultural interests of this country have been overlooked by the national Legislature and by the national Government; and I think we would do well before we come to a vote, either upon the bill offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH] or on the bill before the House reported by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY,] to look to the real causes that have demanded legislation upon this subject, and have brought to the support of a measure for cheapening transportation such earnest and active advocates as the friends of this bill. I admit, sir, that I have doubts, and other members on this floor have doubts, of the constitutionality of this bill; we also doubt the expediency of this bill; but I, for one, say that all my sympathies and my entire feeling are with the parties who are proposed to be benefited by this bill.

As I have said, I am perfectly satisfied that the agriculturists of this country have not had a fair chance in legislation. I am satisfied that the legislation of Congress for the last fifty years has been for the benefit of everybody on the face of God's earth except the tillers of the soil. Whenever a tariff bill was to be passed it was framed and passed in the interest of the manufacturers and not of the agriculturists. If a steamship line was to be subsidized, paid money to enable it to run, it was to be run at the cost, by taxation, of the agriculturists of the country. As my friend from Indiana [Mr. SAYLER] so well said the other day, if men of genius are to be paid for their inventions, they are to be paid out of the hard earnings of the men who till the soil. And if, sir, a little piece of water on the Atlantic coast is to be scooped out, in the district of my friend before me, [Mr. SENER,] for instance, for the benefit of somebody, it has to be scooped out with the money of the agriculturists for the benefit of commerce.

Sir, I do not pretend to be a financier; I never had enough money for my own purposes, and much less to enable me to manage other people's; but when gentlemen propose to regulate the finances of the country, they have invariably, for the last forty or fifty years, invented a system which was to create a monopoly for the capitalist at the expense of the agriculturist. The national banks of this land are a monopoly in favor of money, and that monopoly, too, is paid for by the men who till the soil.

Now, sir, of all the patient people upon the face of God's earth, the men who have worked this land, who have fought the Indians off of it, who have cleared its forests, tilled its fields, built up its cities and villages—all these men have been less cared for, more neglected, and oftener attacked than any other part of the population of the United States. They have been patient. They are taxed now two or three times, as I happen very well to know, down my way. And it is only lately that they have commenced to complain; until now, as my friend from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] has said, they have gotten up a few granges once in awhile, and have taken it into their heads that they can protect themselves. I tell gentlemen here that these millions of voters in the United States have become aroused at last. Whether they are heard in the bill of my friend from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] or in some other bill here; whether he has one that will suit them, or whether one of my pet schemes about water transportation will suit them; whether the one or the other is what they want, you may be sure that they will be heard and will be felt. This thing must be settled, and settled now; it will never be quieted again. If the Constitution prevents its settlement now, they will change the Constitution. It is bound to be settled; they will settle it, notwithstanding the opinions of some gentlemen here or elsewhere. These things will be adjusted, and the men who till the soil will have their fair share in the legislation of this Government which they support.

I looked over the appropriation bills the other day, and I found that there were $29,000,000 appropriated to run the Treasury Department up here, to enable it to make paper money. I found, also, that there were a great number of millions appropriated to run the War Department. Thank the Lord, we have peace now, and I am specially thankful for it myself. Then there was another large number of millions for the Navy Department, although, as some gentleman said here who knows more about it than I do, they did not have a ship that could keep the enemy out of New York Harbor. And then there was $123,000 to keep up the Agricultural Department, to furnish us with seeds, and I expect they will cut that down before they are done with it. That Department is used to a great extent to throw dust in the eyes of our constituents, the agriculturists, by taking them through the conservatory down there, and let them smell a few flowers once in awhile. [Laughter.]

This may be all right, so far as I know. It may be that we need a tremendous Army to keep somebody off; I do not know who it is. It may be that we need a powerful Navy to keep from getting into a fight with somebody, as we almost did a little while ago with Spain. It may be that we need all these millions for our Departments, for the Pension Bureau, the Treasury and other Departments, and a little for the Agricultural Department—the few men over there on the Island. This may be all right. But the people out West and down South and in a few other places, begin to think that the thing is not exactly all right.

As I said, this matter is attracting the attention of the people all over the land. These grangers started sometime ago, and there is great excitement in the minds of the people; there is great thinking and talking and feeling on this subject, more than any other since the war, except it may be out in the West, where the ladies have taken hold of the matter of whisky and are raising the very devil out there generally. [Laughter.] It may be that may produce some dispersion of the amount of feeling excited by this bill. My friend here in front of me, [Mr. SENER,] says that the women are coming here to look after Congress. Well, if they are, Congress will adjourn and leave; that is all I have to say about it. [Laughter.]

Now this matter of cheap transportation, of what is the cheapest transportation, of what is the best transportation, of what is the sort of transportation that will relieve the people, that is the question for us to determine; whether it is involved in a railroad bill, or a canal bill, or a bill for opening the mouth of the Mississippi River. The question which is pressing upon the country now is whether this vast territory, an empire in itself capable of producing in one year bread enough to feed the whole world for three years of famine, whether that land shall have all its productions cooped up, without the ability to get to a market; whether we on the sea-coast shall pay one dollar or one dollar and twenty-five cents a bushel for corn, while it is being burned in Iowa for fuel and does not yield its producer ten cents a bushel?

And it is a question that strikes at the very root of this matter, whether this Government has not the power to relieve these masses of the country in this state of suffering and trouble; whether there should arise in the town of Paterson, New Jersey, as was the case last winter, the cry for "bread or blood;" whether twenty thousand laboring men out of employment should meet in the city of New York demanding wages, repeating the cry of "bread or blood;" whether such things as these should happen when there was being burned in that great western country that which would support life and make those people comfortable. It is, I say, a serious question whether this Government and this people, by reason of the barriers of a few mountains separating the great water highways, are bound to sit still and see want and starvation fall upon laboring men of the East while at the doors of the farmers of the West the means of sustenance are abundant. It becomes the wise men, and good men, and thinking men of this country to see whether some scheme cannot be devised to remedy this evil so that the cheap bread of the West may be brought to the hungry of the East, and that commodities manufactured by these laboring men in the East may be carried to those in the West who have bread to give in return.

It almost brings tears to my eyes to have to separate from my friend from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] on this subject. I wish I could take him by the hand and stand up with him squarely for this bill. It would do me good. I almost wish I could go with everybody in favor of opening up that valley of the West. But I think I can satisfy the gentleman from Iowa that one trouble with him in this case is that, to use the old expression, "he has got the cart before the horse;" that he has started this bill in the wrong place; that he ought to have water communication in advance of the railroad, the railroad being intended to carry the supplies to the water.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The railroads will not let us get to the water.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I understand that there is some difficulty in that direction; but I will show you how I think it can be stopped. I am not here to defend the railroads. These monopolists, who, when the icy hand of winter was laid on the Erie Canal, raised their freights to extort money from the West, need some regulation. I do not believe it right for them to charge as much for carrying a ton of produce one hundred miles as for carrying it one thousand. But I know that there are some troubles that environ the railroads; that they, like persons in other branches of business, have some difficulties to contend with. As was remarked this evening by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD,] the railroads are not to be condemned wholly. They have done much to build up this country. Undoubtedly they have in many cases heaped together money, and sometimes in very uncertain ways. This way of "watering stock" is hardly a fair thing. [Laughter.] They have made combinations; they have formed what they call commercial connections; and in all these combinations they have gathered a power that has taken charge of some Legislatures, and has even knocked at the door of Congress and circulated through these lobbies a great deal oftener than was safe for men who had not strong backbone and a good deal of honesty. It is a part of their policy to form their combinations by which to control States, and if possible control this central Government. I shall, however, return to that point directly.

Now, one word in regard to these gentlemen called the grangers who have alarmed almost everybody in this land. In old Bible times, when a man became sorrowful and distressed on account of his condition, he put ashes on his head and girded his loins with sackcloth; but now when a man, especially a politician and a Congressman, becomes disturbed in any way, he puts hay-seed on his head and girds his loins with a sheep-skin. [Laughter.]

Now, I am not going to raise any row with the grangers. There are some of them, I believe, down my way. I have heard that they recently held a meeting not far from my section of country. I wish to read a resolution adopted by the farmers' convention—I believe they called themselves grangers—held in December, 1873, in Decatur, Illinois:

Resolved, That the existing railway legislation should be sustained and enforced until thoroughly tested by the courts; that we oppose any legislation by Congress under the plea of regulating commerce between the States which shall deprive the people of their present controlling influence through State legislation.

I have also here a resolution of the State Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, adopted at a meeting at Boonville, Missouri, commencing February 18, 1874, and concluded February 24. The committee on transportation of that meeting unanimously adopted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas we deem the facilities afforded by our present system of railroads inadequate to the transportation of the agricultural products of the West to the sea-board; and whereas for the want of sufficient competition railroad companies are disposed to extort rates of freight which are unjust and oppressive: Therefore,

Resolved, That we appeal to our State legislators and Representatives in Congress to use their influence to secure the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River and its principal tributaries by the national Government.

Thus it appears that these Missouri grangers have made up their minds that water transportation is their secure and abiding refuge; and I agree with them on that subject. These Illinois grangers have said that the Legislature of Illinois has a controlling influence over the railroads of that State sufficient for their protection.

My objection to this bill is that even if the system proposed can be perfected and carried out to the fullest extent, it will not give such transportation as is expected by my friend from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY,] and those who stand with him on this subject. If I had time I could show—I will take time anyhow, [laughter;] I can show—by statistics that a bushel of wheat can be carried only nineteen hundred and eighty miles before it is eaten up by freight, without counting any of the little charges for shipping, handling, or anything else.

By water it can be carried profitably fifty-four hundred miles, still leaving sixty cents per bushel to the producer. It is not destroyed by carriage by water under nine thousand miles.

A bushel of corn, as a matter of course, can be carried but one-half as far. So as to iron and other heavy freights, products of the field and mine. These heavy freights are destroyed by any carriage except water carriage, to any reasonable distance. These tables were made up by the late Commodore Maury, who knew what he was about. He states that by the old-fashioned wagon a bushel of wheat can be carried three hundred and ten miles, and is then destroyed by the charge for transportation.

If that be so, then, for long distances in the West, these railroads are unable to carry freights and make money. If that is so, just see the position of one of the long through railroads under this bill. Every one knows that a bushel of wheat cannot come from San Francisco to New York and pay anything. It would be eaten up before it got half way.

If this bill undertakes to regulate produce carried on any one of the long lines, and allows that railroad any profit on the actual cost of making and running that road, then it will allow the railroad more than it now gets. For, Mr. Speaker, I undertake to say these long lines of railroad carry through freights, where there is competition, instead of at a profit, really at a loss to themselves. I have here the report of the great Pennsylvania Railroad, wherein it is stated that they carry through freights at much less than heretofore, decreasing every year. Why do they do it? They do it for the purpose of competing with other long lines. As the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] said to-day, they make it up, however, on local freights. It is stated as a fact, in my own State, that the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad is carrying cotton from Huntingdon to Richmond, Virginia, for twenty-four dollars, when it is known that it costs more than that to do it. Why does it do it? Because the competition up the Ohio to Pittsburgh, and by the Pennsylvania Central Railroad, compels transportation at that price, or that railroad would have to do without it.

This is all the result of competition. Therefore, in reference to railroads in the West, in my own State and all over the country, the complaint is not against exorbitant charges for through freights, but the complaint is general of discrimination against local freights. The complaint is that they charge more for local freights than for through freights. Take the case of the people of my friend from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] who sits near me. Suppose he wishes to ship to the Mississippi River. We all know that they will charge him the same as they would charge him for freight to Chicago. And why? Because there is competition in transportation to Chicago, while there is no competition in carrying freights to the Mississippi River. The railroads discriminate against freights to the Mississippi River and in favor of through freights. The discriminations are in favor of freights to Chicago, to New York, or to any sea-port.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how are you to correct that? The people in the West were so anxious to have railroads that they allowed the railroads to get the advantage of them. You people out West chartered many without regard to fixing what should be the maximum rate for freight. You allowed them to charge whatever they pleased. It is unfortunate that you did so. That is all I have to say on that point.

You, by your Legislature, said to a company of gentlemen that if they would put their money into the enterprise, if they would build a railroad, if they would spend their money to build it, you would allow them to charge three cents a mile for passengers and two cents a ton for freight. They put their money in upon that guarantee and built that railroad. Now you tell them they shall not do that. Why, sir, you would break any railroad on earth if that were to be done. And there is the wrong in this whole thing.

Take the case of the Virginia Midland Railroad, the Alphabet Railroad, as they call it down there. This railroad was built by the stockholders, and the stock is not worth more than fifteen dollars, instead of being worth fifty dollars. Very little stock which was put into any railroad is worth anything. The man who is the mortgagee is the man who makes the money. The original stockholder hardly ever makes anything by holding the stock. It was provided in the charter of the railroad that if the stockholders would go and build the road they should be allowed to charge four cents a mile for passengers and so much for freight. That was the maximum rate which was fixed. This permitted them to charge for through freights as much less as they pleased. It was provided, however, they should charge only so much for passengers and so much for freights. But they were not allowed to charge anything beyond that.

Now, if the money was invested by the people who loaned it to build that railroad, I would like to know whether it is not a violation of their rights to say that Congress should step in and say, "It is true the State of Virginia induced you to invest your money to build that railroad, and you built it, and they guaranteed you so much for freight, but Congress now says you shall not have any such sum, but shall cut down your rates."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I want to put this thing on a square basis. When those companies built those railroads in Iowa the State reserved in so many words the right to regulate the rates of transportation for freight and passengers. Now, then, we can do that to the State line. These railroads were built as Iowa railroads; but they have now become connected with the through railroads, and are controlled by men living out of the State. The State can regulate the rates to the State limits; but nine-tenths of all our shipments are from points in the State of Iowa to points outside of the State; consequently it is not State traffic any more, but becomes interstate commerce, and is outside of the jurisdiction of Iowa. And unless Congress gives us relief, what are we to do?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I thought the gentleman's difficulty was this: that he was not troubled about the price of a ton of wheat, or a ton of bacon, or a ton of any other freight from Iowa to Chicago or New York, because in most instances, it is said, with rarely an exception, the through freight is cheap enough. I supposed his trouble was in regard to the discrimination against the way-stations, which would not let my friend get to the Mississippi River to put his wheat in my canal-boat.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Exactly.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Now, if in the gentleman's State they wisely reserved—as we did not reserve—the right of regulating the rates of transportation of freight and passengers within the limits of their State on their railroads, they have the right to make the railroads carry the gentleman's freight to the Mississippi River at a fair price and put it on my boat.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Then you are all right; you are not hurt.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The mischief is that during the winter months, when four-fifths of all the surplus products of Iowa are disposed of, the boats cannot run, because of three feet of ice on the river; and we have got to go down through Missouri, and, of course, the State of Iowa cannot control anything in Missouri.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Did the gentleman not hear what I read as having been said by the grangers of Missouri as to what they were willing to do? I had thought that the great difficulty with the Iowa men was to get at water communication at reasonable rates. Now, the gentleman says they have got that fixed in the best possible manner by the Legislature of Iowa, and I do not think he is at all as badly persecuted as I had thought he was. I take back what I said, for I find they can get to the water.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. We can get to the ice.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. True; the ice being there he says they have to go into the State of Missouri. Well, I want to show how this bill does not get you out of that trouble. I find one provision in the bill, which, if I had had the making of it, I would not have inserted in it. It looks like the work of my friend from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY,] for whom, however, let me say, I have not only the greatest respect, but a great deal of affection. It would appear that he had some constitutional scruples at this point; and that, perhaps, would not be surprising if he used to be an old-line democrat. He fixed this up very well as far as going through States was concerned; but when he got down there he wrote these memorable words:

But this act shall not be construed as extending to or affecting such commerce as is actually and in good faith completely internal within any one of the several States.

Now it looks as if the gentleman was a little afraid of interfering with the States. Local self-government is becoming to be a little popular. People have dropped the old expression "State rights," and call it "local self-government." My friend from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] said that the doctrine had not been wiped out by the war, but that the name had changed.

Mr. SENER. Which has been very well vindicated in Virginia.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. We are sound on almost everything on the face of the earth down our way. [Laughter.]

Well, now, is there a man in this House who does not recollect the working of the old railway system. A man started from home. Let us suppose it was my friend from Iowa? At the first station he reached beyond the State line he would have to run out with his satchel in his hand up to a ticket-office to buy a ticket for the State of Illinois. And then when he got to the end of the State of Illinois, he would come to another railroad, and he would have then to run and buy him another ticket to carry him across Indiana; and by the time he got to Washington he would have bought half a dozen different tickets and have run himself nearly to death in getting them, so as not to be left behind by the trains.

So, too, when he shipped his goods; if he shipped them from Iowa, he shipped them to a commission-merchant, now called by the grangers "a middleman," who charged him for receiving and forwarding them, and for storage for what he never stored at all, and charged him merely because he had to reship the goods at Chicago; or if he was sending them by Cincinnati, there another middleman got hold of them and charged him for receiving, and forwarding, and storage, and by the time the goods reached New York they had passed over numerous railways chartered by the States, with separate schedules, and he had paid a large amount upon his goods and had nearly run himself to death in getting them through.

Now, for whose benefit was it, for whose convenience, that the railroads made what they call commercial connections and said that you might buy in Keokuk, Iowa, a through ticket to New York, and then you could go into a sleeping car and sleep soundly and never wake until you got to Chicago—who is benefited by these connections? Are we not benefited by them?

There are two railroads which run through my State and which cross my district, one from the Tennessee line to Norfolk, and the other through from the North Carolina line down here to Alexandria, and thence to Washington.

Now, as soon as the railroad companies discover that this system is troublesome to them, will it not be perfectly easy for them to say, "We will have no connections outside of the State, but will do business on the old plan?" Who will be inconvenienced by it? Who will the middleman catch? This commission cannot come into the State of Virginia to regulate her railroad, for this bill says you cannot do that. Who will be inconvenienced and troubled by a return to the old arrangement? Why, the people all over the country; baggage will be lost; freight will be lost and destroyed, and nobody will be responsible; every man will have to buy a small piece of pasteboard upon the border of each State, and then heel it for the nearest station. [Laughter.] We hear a good deal about these monopolists. There is one called Tom Scott, whom I have never seen; and another one was named Fisk, I believe. Then there are the Erie Railroad, and the New York Central, and the Pennsylvania Central. Why, my friend from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] mentioned some two or three dozen of them the other day that he owned, [laughter,] the Lackawanna and all manner of railroads. And there is John W. Garrett, of Baltimore, the stock in whose railroad they say is worth a hundred and forty cents to the dollar. Now, suppose these gentlemen, with all their money and capital should combine together. I sometimes hear it said that out West the railroad monopolies are disturbing the Legislatures greatly, and are interfering with their religious principles and their duties. I hear, too, that in California the railroads are raising a rumpus out there, and disturbing the Legislature there. And they say that the Pacific Railroad even interfered with Congress, and disturbed the equanimity of Congress most amazingly a year or two ago. [Laughter.]

Now, suppose these men put all their money and all their political influence together, and make a combination including every railroad from the Gulf of Mexico to the Saint Lawrence, and put all their interests together, and bring them to bear on Congress, and the President, and the politicians of the country, and get a commission appointed under the influence of those railroad kings, and where are you then, Mr. MCCRARY, and your constituents? [Laughter.] Sir, it is the old tale of the fox and the swarm of flies. That was a smart old fox. When a swallow offered to drive off the swarm of flies which had been teasing and worrying him all day, he said, "O, no, you had better let them stay. If you drive them off, a hungrier swarm will come on, and there will not be a drop of blood left in my body." [Laughter.] Now, it is probably best to let the swarm that has been sucking our blood here for years, and has hard work to get a drop once in awhile, stay. But if you have nine commissioners at $4,000 a year each, with the Lord knows how many clerks and attachés, and the railroads get hold of them, then where is the country, where are the people, where are the grangers? [Laughter.]

One blast upon their bugle horn,
Were worth a thousand men.

Now, I am not speaking of what is impossible, nor am I supposing, in the present virtuous condition of this country on the subject of money, what is improbable. I say that it is in every newspaper in this land, that it is in almost every speech made, that these railroad monopolists, who are fattening upon the sufferings of the people and the hard earnings of the laborers of this land, are gathering the money power and the political power, and wield it for their own benefit and against the interests of the people; and here is a proposition to start up nine of these railroad kings. They might be very pious men, and then they might not. The President might appoint nine first-rate men. I expect he has done that many a time in the last six or seven years; no doubt he has. But, then, he might not do it again. It seems that sometimes he appoints men that the Senate thinks are not half as good as he thinks they are, and then they have to go under. What sort of canal commissioners have you in New York? Politicians, nominated and elected by the party.

Now when these commissioners come to be appointed, is there a man here that will tell me that there will not be many Congressmen and many politicians pulling and hauling his Excellency the President of the United States, and insisting that this gentleman or that gentleman is a most excellent man for a railroad commissioner? That may not only happen, but it certainly will happen. The railroad managers of this country will be behind the scenes, and a great pressure will be put upon the President, and there must be a better man there as President than we have had since General Washington if he can resist that pressure.

These are not the days when men are not susceptible of the influences of their party; these are not the days when men are not susceptible of political influences. If I knew that to-morrow a man from my party, selected from the conservative party of the State of Virginia, would be made President, I would say that he should not have such power as this bill proposes to give; that he should not be subjected to such a temptation; that he should not have this pressure put upon him. Why, sir, a man hardly dies in office of any kind here before the President, up at the other end of the avenue, is besieged by fifty men who think that they have a particular right to tell him who is a good man to put in that place. And do you believe there would not be applicants for these offices at the rate of $4,000 a year, and that there would not be a particular pressure upon the President, and that that pressure, with the influence of these railroad kings, would not have a powerful effect in those appointments? Sir, if there were no other objections to this bill, that point in it would be sufficient to lead me to vote against it.

I am a lawyer when I am at home, and I do not want any better living than I can make under this bill by settling down by a railroad and practicing law. This bill has litigations and costs in it from one end to the other. Let us see. These commissioners say that on our railroad through the State of Virginia, the Great Southern Railroad, the rate of fare on through freight going to New York by the Baltimore and Ohio road shall be so many cents per ton per mile. As soon as they do that somebody raises the cry—they will certainly do it—that there is extortion by the railroads, that they charge more than the rates fixed by the commissioners, and you have a lawsuit at once.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will the gentleman be disturbed if I ask him a question for information?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Not in the least.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Suppose that there were nine corrupt commissioners appointed under this bill, who were servants of the railroads, what harm would happen to anybody more than the present condition of things?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I propose to tell you what would happen. If you had nothing else but railroads, as this bill seems to contemplate, transporting the produce of the West to the East solely by railroad; if you can have no more competition by railroads than you have at the present time, then you will be no worse off one way than the other, except there would be legalized robbery under this bill, indorsed by these commissioners, to plunder the people, with a right to prosecute the railroads if they charge different from the rates fixed by the commissioners, and then you could go into court and be whipped every time. I have had some experience in that myself, and I know what it is to fight a railroad in court.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Suppose the railroad commissioners should fix for one or for all the railroads of the country double the present rates, what harm would they do? Would it be any more than it is now?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. In that case, without the remedy which I am going to give you—and I am going to show you how to get out of the trouble, the very trouble that you want to be rid of—I say that without competition you are now in the hands of the railroads. If you were in the hands of nine corrupt commissioners you would be in the hands of the devil, [laughter,] and you would have no better and no worse chance than you have now, except that the robbery would be legalized. That is all the difference.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. As I understand it at present the railroads fix their own rates.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Except where the charters fix the maximum rates.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. If the commissioners fix the rates less than the railroads wish to have them fixed, then the railroad would have the right to go to a jury, and if the jury refused to sustain the decision of the commissioners, then they must come down in those rates.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Yes.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. But if the commissioners shall fix the same rates which the railroads have fixed, then the public is just where it is now.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. That is what I say.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. They would be in every respect as they are now. There is no change whatever if the commissioners do not reduce the rates.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. There is no difference, as I say, except the fact that by this bill you have legalized this robbery. That is the only difference. But I show you "a more excellent way," in this: that if you put your hand to the plow and open water communications with the West, you then have a mode of transportation which can, by its cheapness, compete with the railroad, so as to make money, and still bring about a reduction of freights. This is the remedy which I suggest.

I concede that in the case supposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts the parties would perhaps be no worse off; but we would have legalized robbery by this bill. The parties would be at the mercy of the railroad just as they had been. This bill offers no remedy. I am going to offer a remedy; I have not yet spoken of my remedy except incidentally. This bill gives no remedy. It leaves you precisely where you were at first.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The bill does not legalize any improper charge by a railroad company.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. By this bill you undertake to set aside the charters granted to the roads by the States. The railroad charters in certain States provide that the companies shall charge only so much per mile as the maximum. You undertake to say that this commission may fix the price of transportation without regard to that maximum, without regard to charters or State laws or acts of the State Legislature; you provide that this commission shall have absolute power to fix the rate of freight. Now, if the maximum provided by the charter were less than the rate fixed by the commissioners, the people would be damaged. That is one instance in which they might suffer from the bill.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I am quite sure that the committee do not so understand the operation of the bill.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Now let me ask the gentleman a question, so that I may put myself right.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Does not this bill in so many words provide that these commissioners shall fix the reasonable rate of compensation to be paid on any railroad?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It does, but it does not give the railroad company any affirmative authority to charge that rate. It simply provides that in a suit between a railroad company and an individual to determine whether the latter has been charged in excess of a reasonable price, the schedule fixed by these commissioners may be given in evidence; and in that case the burden of proof is changed. That is the whole operation of the bill.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Let us see whether that is so. Let me refer to the bill. It provides that a schedule of rates shall be posted up, so that the public may know precisely what are the rates fixed by these commissioners as those which the railroad may charge. If the bill does not vest in the commissioners the right to authorize the companies to charge more than the charter rates, what does it do? Does the gentleman say that under this bill a railroad company cannot charge more than the charter rates?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I do, most distinctly.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. The bill does not say so; there is not a word of that kind in it. It provides that the prices to be charged by the railroads and the reasonableness of them shall be ascertained by this commission; and though the railroad may charge more than the charter rate, this commission has the absolute right to say the charge is not unreasonable. Why have they not the right to say, if they choose to do so, either from corrupt motives or otherwise, that a dollar a mile is not an unreasonable charge?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Suppose a railroad were chartered by the State of Virginia, with a limit on its charges——

Mr. WHITEHEAD. That is exactly how they all are chartered with us.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. And suppose that the railroad commissioners, on a hearing of the railroad companies and of the public—of all parties interested—should fix a higher sum over a certain portion of the route than this Virginia statute had fixed. A man who might complain that the railroad company charged him too much would not, of course, have the special remedy which this bill provides; but he would have every remedy he had previously enjoyed. He would have the right to insist on the limitations of the charter; and the authorities of Virginia could proceed by quo warranto against the company.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Suppose the commissioners should decide that for shipping freight from Norfolk to Memphis a railroad company might charge ten cents per mile per ton; is there any remedy against that? Could not that be done under the bill?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. If the railroad company did not charge more than that——

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Suppose the railroad charged exactly that rate?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Then the individual would not be entitled——

Mr. WHITEHEAD. To any remedy.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The individual would not be entitled to any remedy which this bill provides; but he would be entitled to just such remedies as he would have had if the bill had never been enacted. In other words, the commission, in fixing a rate, simply authorizes an individual to give that rate in evidence on a trial in the United States court for extortion under this bill, and the railroad company, unless they could satisfy a jury that the commission had fixed the rate too low, would be held guilty of extortion. The remedies or the rights of a party in such circumstances would not be changed at all.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I hope the gentleman will permit me to go on with my argument.

Mr. SENER. I hope my colleague [Mr. WHITEHEAD] will be granted an extension of his time. He has been very much interrupted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time can be extended only by unanimous consent.

Mr. SENER. I ask for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I suppose that fifteen minutes will be sufficient.

Mr. FORT. I do not wish to interpose any objection; but it seems to me that fifteen minutes, added to the time the gentleman has already had, would make it rather late for others who wish to speak.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I simply want to close up my argument.

Mr. SENER. I hope my friend from Illinois [Mr. FORT] will not object. His time was extended by unanimous consent several Saturdays ago.

Mr. FORT. I certainly do not interpose any objection.

Mr. SENER. Then I hope my colleague will be allowed to proceed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection; and the time of the gentleman from Virginia is extended for fifteen minutes.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Now, Mr. Speaker, as I have already said, we are brought to two conclusions by this bill. If the railroads do not choose to accept this when it shall become the law, then they will go back to their old system and put us all to the greatest inconvenience. If you fix the charges higher than the charges they are now able to maintain, they will of course accept the bill, and we will be bereft of all redress. You will then take away the right of men to go into the courts to contend for their rights. Then when freight is to be shipped from Norfolk to Memphis it will be shipped under this bill. It will be interstate commerce controlled by this bill, and the party would be bereft of his right to contend that the railroad should be restricted to the terms of its charter. That closes that part of the argument.

I have another objection to this bill, and it is a real objection. If it should pass and become a law, it will, in my judgment, be a source of endless litigation. The party under this now has his remedy against a railroad in the United States courts. If the railroad violates the law and the party is damaged he must sue for redress. Now, if you in the West have had the same experience we have had in Virginia in suits against railroads, you will have found out that it is better to lose a small amount than to have any contest with railroads at all. Indeed, in my judgment, if they have shown any omnipotence, it is in the way they carry on their lawsuits. They always manage to get the very best counsel, and in all cases, whether large or small, trivial or otherwise, they manage to defeat the poor man.

Now I propose a remedy. What is the real remedy for this great outcry on the part of the agriculturists of the West? I am satisfied that the West desires this thing. I am satisfied that there is not a more earnest man on this subject than the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY.] He believes honestly there has been a persecution of his constituents. He desires to relieve them not only in this, but in all other ways. I am also satisfied after repeated conversations with the other gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] that the agriculturists of the West have not a more earnest or an abler worker in their behalf. I believe, however, they are in danger of injuring their constituents by this measure. The first result of the passage of this bill will be to have it hung up in the Supreme Court for three years. You will then strike down the water-lines and leave your people for three years without any means of transportation.

Let me state my own view of this question. I am afraid of the railroad power. I am afraid it is another instance of the old fable of the fox and the flies. I am afraid it is another case of the frogs who prayed for a king, and that they will get such a king down upon them to crush them under his weight. I am afraid that in attempting to escape Scylla they will run into Charybdis. I am afraid that in an effort to escape railroad monopolies the agriculturists will be given over into the hands of the moneyed power, controlled by the railroads themselves, corrupting the country and sapping the vitals of the agriculturists of the land. That is what I am afraid of. When they get the power they will see that no canals are built or rivers improved. They will put a stop to competition. When railroad political influence is in power there will be an end of water communication and cheap transportation.

I will tell you what I think ought to be done. Let the energies of the people of the East and of the West be concentrated for the purpose of opening up great lines of water communication. Let us open the mouth of the Mississippi. Let us improve our great rivers. Let us build a canal around the Falls of Niagara. Let us complete the James River and Kanawha Canal, and build a canal through Upper Georgia.

Mr. GUNCKEL. How much will all this cost?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I do not care how much it will cost. When it is done it will be money in the pockets of the people of the United States. I do not believe in the doctrine taught here by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, that economy will pay a negotiable note when the days of grace have begun to run. I do not believe in saving the Government by attempting a system of economy which turns the weeping women clerks into the street without employment. I do not believe in any such economy which only cuts down the wages of the pages around the Capitol. I do not believe the Government is saving anything by merely cutting down the wages of our door-keepers. I would rather spend more money on works of improvement to pay for honest labor. I believe that it would be true economy to spend the money of the Government for labor in opening up these great lines of water communication. If we do that we will bring back to the Treasury a thousand dollars for every one expended.

I do not care even if it were to cost $500,000,000. The people of the West are entitled to it, I do not care what it would cost. It is an investment which will be of itself much better than building up a Navy, and much better than giving $1,000,000 for the purpose of patching up these old forts along the sea-coast. I see that it is proposed to rebuild Fort Sumter, which was knocked down during the war. We knocked it down, and now it is proposed to build it up again. I am opposed to spending millions of the people's money for the purpose of patching up these old rotten forts. There is to be no more war; and even if there is, we do not want any more forts down our way. Men take money in this way, and cut down the appropriations, and say you have not got enough money to make these improvements. I say the danger is in men like the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who stand up to fight all progress. The danger is not in the ability of this Government to build these lines and improve these rivers. The danger is that men will be controlled by party ideas to vote against necessary appropriations of this kind. I am not one of those men. I will vote for these improvements without caring whose party it hurts; for the people in the West, I say, are entitled to some consideration.

One gentleman debating this bill said that the closing of the mouth of the Mississippi River was what raised the strong arms of the western men in what you call the war of the rebellion. I have a right to speak on this subject, for I felt something of the strength of those strong arms, and know something about it. I tell you they are the men who saved the Union, and, as I have said, they are entitled to some consideration.

Mr. GUNCKEL. You say we call it the war of the rebellion. What do you call that war?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I do not call it at all now. [Laughter.] But I say these men are entitled to consideration. The agriculturists of the West have had, as I have shown, neglect and taxation. They are entitled to this improvement, because it is about all they ever asked. They have paid the customs duties. They have paid the monopoly in favor of banks. They have paid the tax to the inventor and manufacturer, and have not grumbled. And now—if I may be permitted to speak once in awhile myself for republicans in the West—they are asking to have cheap transportation. And my friend from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] is trying to give it them in the wrong way. I wish to give it to them by a sure method, costing two mills a mile from Omaha to Norfolk.

Mr. MCCRARY. Does the gentleman mean to say that I am opposing cheap transportation by water?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. No, sir; I have not said so.

Mr. MCCRARY. I hope the gentleman does not consider this measure antagonistic to what he proposes.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Not at all; only I think the gentleman is a little mistaken about the value of this bill. I am satisfied that the gentleman is as earnestly and as honestly engaged in trying to get cheap transportation for his constituents as any man on this floor, but I think he is mistaken in his remedy. I believe it will prove a reed that will pierce through his own hand. I believe it will prove, if he gets it, a fruitful source of litigation in the courts of the United States; while if all our energies were put forth on the question of opening the Mississippi and its tributaries, connecting the East and West by water, we would have a competition which I could show you would reduce the rates on these railroads so that they will carry freight, as the Pennsylvania Central is now doing, at as low rates as they can possibly stand.

This committee, in their report, say that canals cannot compete with railroads. I say that the canals were foolishly thrown away some years ago. We were like little boys playing marbles who threw away one set of marbles for other toys of a different fashion. We should have kept up the canals and made the railroads feeders of those channels of water communication. If we had spent some of our money in improving the channels of water communication with the West, we should not now have had this cry about the difficulty of getting bread to the East.

In my State we cannot afford to raise corn at a cost of ninety-four cents the bushel. It will pay us better to raise tobacco and fruit. In the Eastern States they can buy grain brought by railroad from the West cheaper than they can raise it. And I tell the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY,] the chairman of the Committee on Railways and Canals, that if these internal communications by water are made, and if they do not succeed in giving all the relief required, then I will join him in giving relief in the way he proposes, and will go with him to amend the Constitution and make his bill constitutional.

I say you are entitled to relief and should have it, but I think you are going the wrong way to get it; a way by which you will get into the hands of these monopolists, and be ruined in the end.

If I had time there are other points I should like to remark upon. I will say this: that I understand the board of engineers have reported that the James River and Kanawha Canal is not only practicable but may be constructed at a reasonable cost, with an abundance of water. And if you get that, there will be no cry of "bread or blood" in New York, and no burning of corn, which my friend from Iowa says takes place in his country. Why should the people there burn their corn when we cannot get enough to eat?

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, if gentlemen of the House can be lured back from the delightful railroad excursions upon which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WHITEHEAD] has been conducting them in his own fancy for the last hour and a half, it might be well to turn to the consideration of the real questions before the House, and see what we may do to enthrone reason and justice.

The flow of emigration to the broad interior of our country and settlement there have found and developed measureless resources, and have brought forth rich productions in amazing quantity, which with increasing volume now seek the quickest and cheapest route to the sea, where they can embark upon that broad and untolled highway leading to all the markets of the world.

For the first time, Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the inland commerce of the country, as borne upon wheels, is before Congress in due form for recognition and regulation. With modest yet earnest appeal this subject of vast concern is presented, and attention demanded. All sections of the country, all parties, all classes and callings and avocations of citizens, are interested.

Our inland commerce is already great, is rapidly increasing, and at times threatens to gorge the present natural and artificial avenues open for its transit.

The overland or interstate carrying business has become second to no other enterprise in magnitude and importance. And, Mr. Speaker, it is believed to be now necessary to regulate those engaged therein by law; and indeed this may not seem strange, when we remember that the human family is not perfect, and inasmuch as the members of the family who engage in the transportation business have not heretofore manifested virtues beyond the average of the brothers engaged in other enterprises.

When we look for authority, Mr. Speaker, to regulate this inland commerce, now carried on by rail, we find that in all its essential relations and qualities it is not unlike other commerce as now and heretofore carried on in this country.

We find that our fathers had difficulty with domestic commerce during the existence of their Confederation. Under that form of Government each State regulated commerce for itself. And, for the most part, such regulation operated injuriously, and at times threatened to destroy their amicable relations.

This demonstrated the imperfection of their bond of confederation and taught them by lessons of experience that the power to regulate internal commerce ought not to be exercised by any State, but should be delegated to the General Government. And when they came to frame the Constitution and establish the Union of the States, they in section 8 of the first article affirmatively committed eighteen subjects to Congress. By the third of these in their order they declare that—

> Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

In the next two sections of the same article they enumerate the subjects over which they forbid Congress to exercise power. To regulate commerce among the several States, it will be seen, is specially, positively, and affirmatively granted to Congress, while the subject is not alluded to among the matters over which the power of Congress is denied.

It may then be inquired what this power to regulate commerce among the States means. Judge Story, in his Commentaries, defines commerce to be and to comprehend, "every species of intercourse between nations and among the people of the several States, including not only all traffic and merchandise and production, but passengers and travelers also." And the same learned commentator, also defines the word "intercourse," used in the definition of commerce. He says that "foreign and domestic intercourse has been universally understood to be within the reach and power of Congress;" and that "the terms of the Constitution are at all times understood to include power over navigation as well as trade, and over intercourse as well as traffic;" and that "in the practice of other countries, and especially in our own, there has been no diversity of judgment or opinion." By which it appears that Justice Story understood this power to extend to passengers and travelers as well as to trade and merchandise.

The Supreme Court say in the case of Veazie vs. Moore, (14 Howard's Reports)—

That commerce in its broadest acceptance embraces not merely traffic, but the means and vehicles by which it is prosecuted.

Justice McLean says—

That transportation is a part of commerce, is no longer an open question.

Chief Justice Taney says:

It has always been admitted in the discussion upon this clause of the Constitution that the power to regulate commerce includes navigation, and ships, and crews, because they are the ordinary means of commercial intercourse. (Smith vs. Turner, 7 Howard.)

Mr. Speaker, if Congress can regulate a ship and its crew, because the ship and crew are engaged in commercial intercourse, does it not follow that Congress can regulate a car and its conductor, when engaged in the very same business?

At the time the Constitution was framed and the first laws passed under it regulating commerce, and the earlier decisions made, it is true there was no commerce by rail, as now, carried on among the States; and some inquire here whether the present condition of things could then have been contemplated. It is indeed probable, sir, that eighty-seven years ago they had never dreamed of this immense inland commerce that now streams and flows everywhere among the States, and on its iron ways shoots from ocean to ocean.

It is said that Franklin expressed a desire to return in a hundred years to see what his loved Philadelphia might be by that time. No doubt he pictured a grand old city, as it already is; but his imagination hardly saw the commerce of to-day rolling overland in every direction, hastened and quickened by means of the electric spark with which he was then wont to play and to sport, unconscious of its utility when fully domesticated and harnessed in wire and cable.

They in those days may not have foreseen the lines and avenues, the instrumentalities, the carriages, and the vehicles now used; yet they adopted broad principles in language that applies to and covers all these things now used.

It cannot now be known or foreseen what different and varied means may yet be used to carry on the future commerce of this people. And it may be asked what difference it will make in principle how much these instrumentalities may vary and change in form and application. They are and will be in the service of commerce, and must be judged and regulated by the same law that governs other means of transportation, which transportation is but the servant of commerce. And we are not without light from the Supreme Court, showing us plainly that this power covers inland transportation upon wheels.

Justice Miller, in the Clinton Bridge case, already referred to, says:

Another means of transportation, equal in importance to the steamboat, has also come into existence since the Constitution was adopted—a means by which merchandise is transported across States and kingdoms in the same vehicles in which it started. The railroad now shares with the steamboat the monopoly of the carrying trade. The one has with great benefit been the subject of salutary congressional legislation, because it is an instrument of commerce. Is there any reason why the other should not? However this question may be answered in regard to that commerce which is conducted wholly within the limits of a State, and is therefore neither foreign commerce nor commerce among the States, it seems to me that where these roads become parts of great highways of our Union, transporting a commerce which embraces many States, and destined, as some of these roads are, to become the channels through which the nations of Europe and Asia shall interchange their commodities, there can be no reason to doubt that to regulate them is to regulate commerce both with foreign nations and among the States; and that to refuse to do this is a refusal to discharge one of the most important duties of the Federal Government. * * * For myself, I must say that I have no doubt of the right of Congress to prescribe all needful and proper regulations for the conduct of this immense traffic over any railroad which has voluntarily become part of one of those lines of interstate communication, or to authorize the creation of such roads when the purposes of interstate transportation of persons and property justify or require it.

Mr. Speaker, some of the points adverted to may not have been raised in the case. And it may be claimed that as to such the above is not authority, but it certainly shows what the learned judge thought about the question.

Trade and traffic and commerce are the same, whether carried on over the ocean upon the floating palace or over the desert upon the jolting dromedary; whether upon the steamer over inland waters or upon the pack-mule over the plains. Whether by craft or by car it is commerce, and as it varies in line or in means so may be varied, if need be, the laws regulating it.

It may become us to inquire whether this power, if admitted, ought to be exercised by Congress, and if so, to what extent.

Many are constrained to concede the authority of Congress, but insist that necessity does not require, and in fact forbids, the exercise of such power. This is the position taken in debate by my genial colleague who sits on the other side of the Hall, [Mr. EDEN.] On most questions we agree, but on this, as on some others, we widely differ. After conceding that the committee's bill was constitutional, he went on and said:

But I deny the second proposition laid down by the committee, as follows:
That to regulate the charges for carrying freight or passengers upon interstate railroads, so as to limit them to what is fair and reasonable and prevent extortion, is a legitimate exercise of the power to regulate such commerce.

And proceeding further, he said:

That, in my judgment, this second proposition is supported neither by reason nor authority.

In taking this position my colleague amazed me. He admits the power, and then says, to prevent extortion and to limit charges to reasonable rates is not a legitimate exercise of that power.

He distinctly admitted in debate, and is so recorded on page 16 of the RECORD of March 15, 1874, that Congress has the power under the Constitution to enact the pending bill into a law, and then declared that Congress had no authority to exercise that power. This is indeed new doctrine to me. He must presume this power to be dormant. By what rule may we know what power is dormant and what has vitality? Only the other day some one on that side of the question was laboring in profound argument to prove that although it must be admitted that the letter of the Constitution declared the existence of this power, yet by the ingenious application of reason it could be ascertained that there was some mysterious and hidden spirit in that instrument that interposed, neutralized, and counteracted that power. The argument was more ingenious than satisfactory to me. But my colleague found out a better and plainer way to dispose of this power. He would march up to it straight, admit it, and then declare it to be dormant.

My colleague drew a sorry prospective picture of these railroad corporations, as seen by himself, if this bill become a law and be enforced. He said:

Upon what rule of construction can it be claimed that Congress, under the power to regulate commerce among the States, can fix the price of the commodity called freight, and cannot fix the price of all other commodities when used as elements of interstate commerce?

And again he said—

Sir, the bill before the House is the initial measure which, if successful, will be followed up by a system of legislation that will in the end overthrow every vestige of both individual and State rights.

I beg him to indulge in no such gloomy feelings of despondency. The railroads will not be utterly destroyed from the face of the land. The rights of no man or corporation to do and exercise their reasonable rights will be abridged. By examination of the bill he will find that it is only wrong and extortion that are to be forbidden. He need not fear; there is no lion in his path.

I am sorry to part company with my friend and colleague [Mr. EDEN] on this question. It was my hope, and would have been my pride, to see the Illinois delegation here march up with solid and unbroken front to the support of this measure, which, in my judgment, is so vital to the best interests of the citizens of that great State.

Mr. Speaker, this occasion would not permit the array of all the wrongs complained of. They are notorious, and need not be pleaded specially. Inland commerce has suffered beyond reason by the extortion and greed of its carriers. Between attempted relief and further endurance we may now choose. If competition was allowed to have its free sweep no legislation would be wanted. But competition is tampered with, bought up, and enchained. Combinations of monstrous corporate companies make and execute their decrees, and scorn a puny single-handed contest. It has been truly said in other years that wherever combination is possible, competition is impossible. To break down these combinations and unfetter inland commerce, this bill is brought in. In its construction the committee have labored faithfully, and are entitled to thanks.

Our opponents ask us, Mr. Speaker, whether commerce has been excessively tolled. This could be answerd generally or in detail. By a statement recently published (and which I presume is by authority, yet I do not know, and so cannot vouch for its authenticity, but if not true I hope some gentleman will correct me,) it is shown that the annual earnings of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company are stupendous.

I will ask the Clerk to read a portion of the remarks of F. B. Thurber, of New York, recently made before a convention.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. President and gentlemen of the convention, the gentleman from Saint Louis has just named the Baltimore and Ohio road as one road which has been honestly managed, and I wish to show this convention, from recently published statistics, what honest management has done for that road. It operates 1,101 miles of road, with a capital stock of $16,711,100, and a bonded debt of $10,169,087—a total of $26,980,087.

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad in the last six months paid out of its own current and accumulated earnings a cash dividend of 10 per cent.; expended $10,000,000 cash in new rolling-stock, bridges, steel tracks, and new roads; reduced its indebtedness, and added $2,800,000 to its surplus fund. Discarding fractions, its gross earnings in the year were $15,500,000; expenses $10,000,000; net earnings $5,500,000. Of the year before the net earnings were $5,000,000. Despite the extraordinary expenditures the company added $2,882,000 to its surplus fund, which on the 1st of October, 1873, amounted to $29,034,404. The company enjoys a credit, at home and abroad, superior to that of any other railroad company in the United States. It does business on the cash principle. It buys and builds with its own money. It has now under construction a road through Ohio and Indiana to Chicago, which was progressing during the whole season of the panic, and will be completed to Chicago during 1874.

This is what a road can do when honestly managed; and all this time it has carried freight cheaper than any other trunk line between the East and the West.

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, if these are the receipts of a railroad honestly managed, what may be the income of a road that does not enjoy such a reputation?

If only such tribute had been levied upon the commerce of the people as would have paid a reasonable, yes even a liberal, dividend on the capital stock actually invested, we would not be considering the pending bill to-day.

Mr. Speaker, I will thank the Clerk to read another statement relating to another road, which I understand is true, yet I have no personal knowledge of the facts therein stated.

The Clerk read as follows:

In regard to the watering of stocks, the obligations of the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad at this time amount to about $90,000,000, while it is susceptible of proof that the total cost to its stock and bond-holders was less than $25,000,000. Eight per cent. dividends are regularly paid on the former sum, thus imposing an annual burden on commerce, on $65,000,000 of fictitious capital, amounting, at 8 per cent., to over $5,000,000. The outstanding obligations of the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroad now amount to about $75,000,000, for which not more than $25,000,000 were ever paid by its stock and bond holders. The watering of stock, in one form or another, has been practiced by nearly all of the principal companies in this country, and it is estimated that about one-third of all the stock of railway companies in the United States has been issued upon a fictitious basis.

After such exhibits as these, can we wonder that the whole country is crying out for reform in the management of our railways?

Mr. FORT. These enormities, if true, are sufficient, in my opinion, to demand relief. Why this watering of stock, as it is called? We are told that it is a private matter, and is not our concern. Sir, it is to hide the enormous per cent. that would otherwise be paid as dividends on the stock. If it is a matter of no public concern, why do they resort to this subterfuge to cover up their profits? Sir, shall commerce be compelled to pay a dividend on thin water?

The gentleman from Virginia, who has just taken his seat, [Mr. WHITEHEAD,] and others in debate before him, have asked how we are going to ascertain what is unreasonable toll, and prevent its collection. It may be difficult, as are many other matters about which we are called to legislate.

Sir, if we are to stop and turn back every time some timid member cries out that he sees a lion in the path, we will do but little. If we should pass no law because somebody or some corporation might peradventure oppose it, or because there might be some difficulty in its execution, we had better adjourn to-day and go home. If we have no more courage than that, our friends ought never to have permitted us to pass the garden gate without a guide. Why, sir, if there was nobody to oppose, or make trouble, we would want no law of any sort. The wicked will not cease from troubling until the millennium comes. If the statements are true as to the roads just mentioned, it would not be difficult to establish the fact judicially, and in justice to commerce the extortion ought to be, and could be, prohibited.

It is believed, Mr. Speaker, that the great corporations controlling the four or five through lines of railroad from East to West form combinations not only to put up and keep up rates beyond reason, but also to prevent the construction of new lines for competition.

No additional through line has recently been constructed. The monsters now in the field are able to swallow any new enterprise that promises competition.

It is true they have encouraged and assisted in building new roads in the East and in the West, because these become their feeders.

The people have been asked in many localities to contribute, and have voluntarily and liberally done so to the extent of millions; and the corporations have swallowed all they donated, and return the favor by tolling to the utmost possible extent; and to the expostulation of the people make answer that they want to be let alone in the enjoyment of their vested rights. "Non-intervention" is the watchword of their corporate faith. It is the old story of the white man and the Indian equitably dividing their game, the turkey and the turkey-buzzard, and it is always buzzard to the people.

They say these are private institutions under State protection. On this point my colleague [Mr. EDEN] used strong language. He said:

Upon what principle, then, of right or justice can the Federal Government, after the State, in the exercise of a constitutional right, has granted a charter for the construction of a railroad, and individuals in pursuance of legal authority have invested their money in the construction and equipment of such a road, step in and take charge of the business of the company and control the same against the will of the State and of the owners of the road?

They are citizens or creatures of sovereign States, and it is non-intervention he cries.

If they would confine their operations to the boundaries of their respective States, Congress would certainly have no power over them. Then the State could and ought to restrain their rapacity. To that doctrine I was on record by my vote in the Legislature of my State years ago. And I hold to that opinion still. We do not propose to contravene the right of any State to regulate the commerce on its own railroads within its own limits, but each State can continue to exercise this power and to the same extent as now.

But, sir, when these State corporations go beyond the borders of the State that gave them being, and engage in carrying the commerce of the several States, then they voluntarily place themselves under the jurisdiction of Federal power for reasonable regulation.

We are reminded every day and every hour of the day, by gentlement, of State rights.

Sir, I am in favor of State rights in the strictest sense. I will go as far as he who goes farthest in respect to and for all reasonable State rights. I would not infringe upon them in the slightest degree. I may differ with my friends over there, as to what State rights are, in a few cases, and so in this instance. I cannot see that any such question as State rights is involved in this measure. It is not contemplated to enter any State and regulate any of its institutions or domestic affairs. For all this bill would interpose, the corporations or the citizens of any State may trade and traffic and carry and extort among themselves to their hearts' content; nor can the stranger that goes within their gates claim any protection under this bill. It is those corporations and individuals of the States who choose to go beyond their borders and engage in carrying the commerce of the country which pertains to no one State that may be regulated under this bill. When corporations or individuals leave their own State and enter the general field of commerce to embark in the carrying trade for gain and profit, then they ought to be governed by some general and uniform law.

State sovereignty, as I have always understood it and respected it, was not a thing to be put on and worn like a cloak, wheresoever the citizen might roam, to shield from the force of the laws of other jurisdictions.

Distinguished gentlemen on the other side of this question have applied with great ingenuity and eloquence the argument of existing contracts, made between these corporations and the States that gave them their charters. Why, sir, this argument would not befog a town meeting in my State. I was surprised to hear it here.

That a State can make a contract with a corporation to which it grants a charter, authorizing such corporation, as a public common carrier, to demand and receive unreasonable and extortionate toll, to all time, even within the State, I deny. Such a contract would be void. The rights of the people of a State and of their posterity to all time, cannot be thus bartered away by any sovereignty whatever. Such rights cannot be ceded by the ancestor. The right to restrain a public common carrier to reasonable rates of toll is inalienable, and always reserved, in my judgment.

But, sir, the doctrine that a State can give a charter to, and contract with, a corporation, permitting unreasonable and unlimited tolls to be demanded and received, to all time, not only within such State but anywhere within the United States, is startling.

I ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ARTHUR] whether the State of Illinois could charter a transportation company, and agree that it might fix its rates of toll, without limit, for carrying freight or passengers from State to State, and a jury of Kentucky would be bound to award unreasonable and extortionate compensation because of such contract made between Illinois and the corporation?

Sir, this contract doctrine is not sound. The only force such contract could have must exist between the State and the corporation, and be limited to the jurisdiction of that State; and, as I have just said, to the bounds of reason there.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WHITEHEAD] has just declared that the party to which he belongs will never allow the validity of contracts to be infringed by the Federal Government. I certainly wish to interfere with no contract; but I claim he has no more right to plead a contract here than he would have to plead in Illinois that a contract made with his State allows him to claim exemption from the criminal or other laws of that State or of the United States.

Sir, this doctrine of contract is on our side in this contest.

When a State places the sword of sovereignty in the hands of a corporation, with which to cut its way through private property and private rights, and grants to it the right of eminent domain, by which it can seize and appropriate the dearest and most sacred spot of earth the citizen can have, then it is that a contract is entered into between the State and the corporation receiving the charter, that reasonable rates only shall be charged. The corporation, by accepting its charter, agrees to be governed by reason.

Gentlemen constantly say that we are hostile to railroads, and would ruin them. In this again they are mistaken. I know I am not unfriendly, how much soever I may dislike and deplore the management of some of them.

Gentlemen do not mean, I hope, that our degree of friendship should be so strong as to lead us to declare that all their shortcomings were virtues.

Sir, I certainly am a friend to the human race, and yet I believe in passing good and wholesome laws to prevent the stronger and the more rapacious from extorting of and wronging the weaker and the meeker of the race. My friend from Virginia [Mr. WHITEHEAD] and other gentlemen say we have forgotten our obligations to railroads, and with no little ostentation they tell us that the railroads have made us in the West all that we are; that without them our interior would have remained an unsettled and howling wilderness; and in heavy and measured tones they turn and ask us, "What would you have been without them?" and then pause, in an attitude and air that seem to say, "Now we have silenced you."

Sir, let me ask them, with the air and attitude omitted, what would the railroads have been to-day had not the pioneer and the emigrant tamed and domesticated the wilderness, and made it produce and send forth this magnificent commerce from which they reap a rich harvest of gold? What would they have been without us?

I admit, sir, that neither is independent of the other, and that each is interested in the prosperity of the other. We would not injure them if we could. That would ruin ourselves. I will not admit, however, that we are under more obligations to them than they are to us.

The people have shown their good will by the contributions of millions in local aid, more than they ought to have done, but at the time it was thought to be the best to do as they did. The roads have stretched out their iron arms to clasp us in their loving embrace, but in no known instance, to myself, have they ever favored or remembered their friends who made them such costly contributions. They generally fingered their pockets for all the toll and tribute they could find.

I do not claim that these large subsidies were made by the people from the impulse of any special affection for the railroads, but it was in hope of bettering their condition. I do not suppose there was any considerable amount of disinterested benevolence on either side. I shall assist in making no unjust war on railroads. It is the unfair and unjust management of some of them that I would correct. I wish them all prosperity, and desire them to extend and be multiplied. They have, with commendable enterprise and energy, followed the settler and frontiersman and carried their supplies, and returned with their rich produce of mine and soil. They have expended their capital and wrought with hand and brain, and deserve their reasonable reward, which no voice or vote of mine shall deny them.

But, sir, it is not of such roads, or of the men who have constructed them, that complaint is usually made. It is the stock-jobbers and stock-gamblers who get a controlling interest, and then fleece not only the people, but like cannibals eat out the minority of their own stockholders, that most need regulation. These arethe gentlemen for whom our sympathy is implored from the other side.

We must have relief if relief can be had. Mild measures are here proposed. If not effectual, or if defeated in the courts, some other remedy will then be proposed. What remedy, we may not now know. It will, of course, be peaceful, but it must be effectual. I should regret the necessity; yet if nothing else will break the combinations of these monster corporations, and stop their extortion, then the Government ought to construct at least one grand trunk line across the country for experiment, upon which commerce can be trucked at cost, and then let these combinations compete with it till they are satisfied.

This, Mr. Speaker, I would recommend only if other means fail to secure the results desired. The Government may have enough to do without constructing railroads. Yet, sir, it would be well to give these corporations earnest notice that if other remedies did fail, there was one remedy, clearly constitutional, which would not fail.

Mr. Speaker, our opponents condemn the pending bill because of the power to be vested in the commissioners. Here the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WHITEHEAD] puts in his heaviest licks. He fears these commissioners will be despots, and utterly ruin the people. It may be admittted that this objection has some force; but, sir, it is difficult to have any law of value without some power vested in its executors. Will gentlemen look at the bill and see what power these commissioners have?

In the first place, it is proposed by the bill to apply the principles of the common law to common carriers engaged in interstate commerce, and restrain them only to reasonable rates of toll. Is this either oppressive, dangerous, or objectionable?

I was surprised to hear the able gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. SCUDDER,] and other gentlemen in debate the other day, claim that legislative power was granted to these commissioners. Of course such power cannot be delegated; everybody knows that. But, sir, there is no such attempt in the bill; and he as well as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ARTHUR] failed to point out where or how it so appeared.

These and other gentlemen have proceeded with their arguments as though the commissioners were empowered to arbitrarily fix the rates of toll, which would unalterably bind all parties to keep and observe them, and denounce it as a secret, ex parte, star-chamber adjudication of the rights of the corporations.

Sir, their arguments are unsound and unfair. They do not understand the bill, or I do not. This commission is to be organized and charged with the duty of investigating and ascertaining from evidence what would be reasonable and fair rates of toll on lines of interstate transportation by railroad. And if they find that the rates of any railroad are already fair and reasonable, they may make no schedule of rates of toll for such road; and so that road will not be interfered with.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Does the gentleman think that any railroad company, unless for the purpose of making a test case, would put its rates higher than those fixed by the commission, if this bill should pass?

Mr. FORT. They could put their toll up or down, just as they saw fit. If they put their rates down, all right; if they put their rates up, we will then prosecute them and test our law. And, for one, I say to the gentleman that I shall hold to this doctrine until driven from it by the decision of the Supreme Court.

It seems to me the law will do no harm. The roads cannot put their rates of toll up, for they are already as high as they can possibly get them, unless they take the entire article shipped for toll.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to return to the bill. We will see that in cases where the commissioners shall find and determine that the rates of toll demanded and received by any railroad are unreasonably high, and extortionate, they shall make and certify a schedule of fair rates for such road, and give notice of the same. Whereupon such railroad can conform its rates thereto, or may, if thought best, disregard the action of the commissioners. During all the time said commissioners are taking testimony, considering and determining what the rates of toll ought to be on any railroad, it can, by its officers, attorneys, and witnesses, be present and be heard. Thus far, certainly, no person or corporation will be harmed.

Now, let us see what force this action of the commission has, and whether it is final or conclusive. In case any railroad company shall fail to respect the action of the commissioners, and shall continue to charge and collect unreasonable rates of toll after notice that said certified schedule has taken effect, then a prosecution may be commenced by any person aggrieved in the proper court. And this bill provides that, should they so desire, the railroad companies may have their trial before a jury, just as mortal beings do. Is there anything so terrible in this, Mr. Speaker, as to make gentlemen shudder, as they seem to do? These corporations seem to tremble at the mere mention of a trial by jury.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WHITEHEAD] threatens us with the displeasure of the farmers and grangers, and with the wrath of the democracy of the entire country, if we should pass and attempt to enforce this bill. He says his party was always against this measure, and that the grangers are opposed to it. He may know all about the matter, as he claims. He read from what he called the granger platform, adopted at Decatur, Illinois, I believe, and says they are with him on this question. I shall enter into no controversy with him here on that point. I did not propose to argue this question from the standpoint of any political platform, and was sorry to hear him lugging his politics into this debate.

Now, let us see what is done with this schedule of rates of toll.

On the trial of such cases this bill would simply permit the certificate, so made by the commission, to be introduced and read as prima facie evidence throwing the burden of proof upon the defendant, to show that such railroad was not guilty of extortion. And here ends the full power and influence of the commissioners.

This testimony, taken, digested, collated, and put into the shape and form of a certificate, by these commissioners, goes to the jury as prima facie evidence only to prove unfair charges.

The Government thus assists the individual by collecting at public expense his evidence to be used by the citizen in prosecuting his case against these corporations. Otherwise, he, being the plaintiff, might have to call into court a hundred witnesses to prove, prima facie, just what may be proven by the certificate of this commission. This time and expense are thus saved, and that is all.

So far, we see the case is only half tried. The defendant or the railroad corporation is in court, and can bring its books and papers, its officers, its counsel, its servants, employés, and witnesses, and give testimony to overthrow the certificate of this commission, and if they can prove their rates of toll are not unfair, unreasonable, or extortionate, they will beat the prosecution, and get judgment for costs. If they cannot do this, or the prosecution can then by credible testimony sustain the commissioners' certificate, or schedule of toll, and the jury be convinced that such railroad corporation had been guilty of acts of extortion, then it must suffer judgment.

What peculiar hardship is there in this? The gates of appeal are open to the corporations all the way up till they get to the Supreme Court, before whose judgments and decrees the citizen bows without complaint. Ought they not to do the same?

Why should the gentleman have so much concern and sympathy for these railroads, when they are to be tried in a lawful court by a jury just as any private individual is tried?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I want to correct the gentleman. Nothing that I said was in favor of the railroads. I only alluded to that matter, as we are now doing, as that which may produce litigation which the railroads could stand but the farmers could not. Is he not a farmer himself?

Mr. FORT. The gentleman's argument was indeed very artful all the way through his long speech, and professed a sort of love for the farmer; but at the same time he came in on the home stretch with a glorification of the railroads.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. The gentleman need not complain of that, for he is in the same strain himself, tickling the farmers. Is the bill not a farmers' measure, and is he not a farmer himself? He has not answered whether he is a farmer.

Mr. FORT. Yes, I am a farmer, actually and practically, and I represent farmers of all parties, and I believe they are all interested in the passage of this bill, or some similar measure. The gentleman did not think I was a farmer, I suppose, and that I was entitled to speak for that class of men. He will allow me to remind him that neither he nor the gentlemen with whom he acts here in stout opposition of this bill, may have a monopoly to speak for all the farmers of the country. He hints at some mysterious understanding he has with farmers that I do not understand, and shall not trouble myself to know. And since my friend from Virginia manifests so much desire to know what my occupation has been, I will say to him, that while I have never penetrated very far into the profound depths of the law, yet I read and observe just enough to make me believe this bill ought to pass and that it would be a righteous law, and would benefit my constituents and at the same time be just to the railroads.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Does the gentlemen claim to represent democrats?

Mr. FORT. Yes, certainly I claim to represent democrats. I humbly represent the people to the best of my ability. And as their representative I know no distinction or difference. If I know myself, I desire to assist as best I can in promoting the general welfare and prosperity of all alike; and I will say to my friend from Virginia that I do not believe we have any such democrats in my district as he talks so much about. But, Mr. Speaker, I did not and do not propose to discuss political parties. Other gentlemen may see some political significance in this measure, I confess I cannot. My friend from Virginia seems to be waiting for such questions in every thing that comes up.

I understood the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] the other day to doubt whether the burden of proof could be shifted in this manner, but he could hardly have been in earnest. It would be strange if the law-making power could not make or change a rule of evidence. Sir, there is nothing new in providing that the certified schedule of these commissioners, made under oath, should be received as prima facie evidence. In a thousand cases the certificate of a single officer, and often not even under seal, is received in evidence prima facie, and thus shifts the burden of proof to the other side. Often it happens that an instrument of writing which sometimes turns out to be a forgery is admitted as prima facie evidence, and thus shifts the burden of proof.

I can see no hardship in this part of the bill. If this certificate is false or unfair, it will be the easiest thing in the world for these railroad corporations to make it so appear. Their arguments on this portion of the bill are artful and ingenious, but are without foundation. There is no legislative power committed to the commissioners. They have no absolute power. Their action is not final. Their office is to collect information and evidence, to digest, codify, and put it into form, and to certify to it under oath, for the use and convenience of such as may wish to contest the right of a person or railroad corporation to collect unreasonable and extortionate toll.

If there be any question in this whole matter, it is as to the power of Congress to exercise any restraint whatever upon the charges of a common carrier of interstate commerce, or to apply the principles of the common law to those engaged in transportation, and limit charges to reason. I entertain no doubt.

Gentlemen have admitted and precedent has settled the policy that Congress, under the power to regulate commerce among the States, can prohibit the employment of persons as engineers, pilots, or captains who do not possess certain acquirements. It would seem to require no greater exercise of power to provide that a person should not be allowed to demand an unreasonable compensation than it would to provide that a person should not be employed at any price unless he possessed certain attainments.

It is true, the reason for interference is different. In one case it is the safety of commerce and trade that it is desired to protect; and in the other it is the general prosperity and welfare of commerce that it is desired to promote. But the extent of power that would enhance the former would seem to cover the latter.

Had time offered opportunity, I should have attempted to flash the glimmer of my dim lamp upon the broad and deep foundation principles of democratic government that underlie this bill, and which, in my judgment, are yet to protect the many and the meek against the organized and crafty few, and ultimately place each citizen, however humble, upon an equal footing with every other force. But I can make no such attempt now, and I will hasten on.

Many members declare their hostility to this bill because of the additional power and patronage to be placed in the hands of the President, which may be used, as they fear, for partisan purposes. Other members, well disposed to the measure, hesitate to commit such vast interests to the hands of any nine commissioners.

But, sir, should those great interests suffer or languish because some mischief may be feared, or that some commissioner or President might control some little patronage? I admit there is force in such objections, but not of sufficient weight to endanger the bill. On this point my colleague [Mr. EDEN] puts in his weightiest protest, which I will thank the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to inquire as to the expediency of the measure before the House. If Congress has the power claimed for it by the committee, I ask if it is the part of wisdom to surrender the power into the hands of the Executive. He is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. He has under his control the Post-Office Department, with all its vast machinery and patronage. He has under his command an army of revenue officers. Over three hundred millions of money is every year disbursed by the executive branch of the Government. Three hundred and fifty millions of dollars of the circulating medium of the country are issued by national banks, under the direction and control of the Treasury Department. An innumerable host of Federal office-holders stand ready to do the bidding of the President. And yet Congress, claiming the power to establish the rates of freight and passenger charges on railroads operated in two or more States, shrinks from the performance of that duty, and devolves it on nine commissioners to be appointed by the President, and removable at his pleasure.

These nine men will have the power to enrich or impoverish every railroad company in the United States. They may, if they choose, drive commerce from every great city by discriminating against them in freight charges, and force commerce to new centers by discriminating in their favor.

The commissioners will have power to establish rates that will keep Illinois and Iowa out of the markets of the world, and to favor Ohio and Indiana by rates that will enrich their people. Seventy thousand miles of railroad will be subject to the control, to a greater or less extent, of these nine commissioners. Each railroad company will rush to the autocrats of interstate commerce to beg or buy favors. The people of every city in the United States will be suppliants at their feet for favors. The great manufacturing establishments will be compelled to bow down before this old idol that is about to be set up for worship. There will be no power higher than the commissioners, except the will of the President to remove them in case they fail to do his bidding.

When this system of legislation shall have been fully inaugurated there will be no further use for a written Constitution; no necessity for State governments. Under a latitudinous construction of Federal power, whatever policy may, for the time being, seem to commend itself to public opinion, can be carried out by congressional legislation.

When a proposition is gravely presented to the consideration of the American Congress to place under the control of the President of the United States the larger portion of the internal commerce of the country, we may well be alarmed as to what may follow.

Mr. FORT. I do not feel so despondent as my colleague. I trust he will cheer up. The objections on this ground, however, are worthy of consideration, and, if possible, I would concede some amendment. The committee that drafted this bill is able, and they have been faithful in their labors. The bill is good, and I shall vote for it whether amended or not.

But with a friendly purpose, and to obviate in part, if possible, the objections raised by my colleague and others, rather than my own, I will propose for the consideration of the committee, and of the House, an amendment. And as I will not be able to get the floor at the proper time, I will submit it now.

I would strike out sections 3 and 4 of the proposed bill, which the Clerk will please read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. There shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a board of railroad commissioners, which shall consist of nine members, one of whom shall be selected from, and be a resident of, each of the judicial circuits of the United States. Said board shall be composed of disinterested persons, and no person shall be a member thereof who is in any manner interested in the stock, bonds, or property of any railroad or other transportation company; and the duties of said board shall be as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 4. That the members of said board shall hold their offices for a term of six years, and until their successors are appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by the President; and they shall receive, as full compensation for their services, the sum of $4,000 per annum each, and their actual and necessary traveling expenses, to be stated under oath, and audited as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct. At the first meeting of the board after their appointment they shall divide themselves, by lot, into three classes. The members of the first class shall continue for two years; of the second class, for four years; of the third class, for six years, so that one-third may be appointed every second year; and whenever vacancies shall occur in said board the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall fill such vacancies by appointment for the unexpired portion of said term.

And in lieu of them insert:

There shall be established a board of railroad commissioners, to consist of one member from each State of the United States.

The members of said board shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from any number of such disinterested persons as may be found to be qualified therefor, by the respective Legislatures of the several States, to serve for two years and until their respective successors are appointed: Provided, That the term of the first commissioners shall commence on their appointment and expire on the 4th day of March, 1875: Provided further, That until the Legislature of any State shall take action, the governor of such State may ascertain and certify to the qualifications of persons for commissioners: And provided further, That the President may remove any of the members of said board for cause. And whenever any vacancy shall occur in said board the President shall fill the same for the unexpired term as in case of original appointment.

No person shall be appointed a member of said board who is the owner of, or in any manner interested in, the stock, bonds, or property of any railroad or other transportation company, or an officer, attorney, or employé thereof; and the duties of said board, and the members of the same, shall be as hereinafter provided.

Mr. FORT. If this bill becomes a law, nothing will satisfy its friends short of its vigorous application and execution.

Considering the magnitude of the interests involved, the number of commissioners proposed by the amendment may not be considered unreasonable. The number of railroad commissioners of a single State usually consists of from three to five members. A less number than one member from each State might do the business as well in less time and at less expense. But they might be more easily swayed, influenced, or controlled. "In the multitude of counsel there is safety." The action of large commissions and boards has, as a rule, been more satisfactory and freer from suspicion of improper influence. The additional expense of a board thus large, considering the weighty responsibility and interests involved, would not be great.

If any good is to come from the labors of this board it must not only be pure, but it must command general confidence and respect.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is the even distribution of these commissioners among all the States, representing every locality, and thus securing information on every interest so requisite to a fair adjustment of this matter, that most commends the proposed amendment. And the mode of their selection will avoid objections already referred to, and would certainly be more republican. The Constitution provides that the President shall appoint all officers established by law, and of course he could not, if we so desired, be abridged in his prerogative.

The bill as it now stands selects classes of persons from whom the President shall appoint; and the amendment goes only a step further, and provides that the qualifications for commissioners shall be ascertained by the Legislatures of the several States, and thus further limits the President in his choice.

There is a precedent for confining the President in his selection to the nomination of a single individual made by the respective governors of each State, in which case the present Executive followed the provisions of the law, and appointed the nominees of the governors These appointments are to be made from among such persons as the respective Legislatures may find qualified. The number of persons to be recommended is not limited.

Attorney-General Legare once gave an opinion on a question involving a similar principle. He said:

It would be a fair constitutional exercise of the power of Congress to require that the Secretary of the Treasury should make an appointment out of a certain number of nominees proposed by a collector.—4 Opinions, 169.

Attorney-General Akerman has discussed this question at considerable length in an opinion given on questions arising under the civil-service laws and rules. He held that the appointing power was in the President, to be used at his discretion, without positive limitation. But he says:

Though the appointing power alone can designate an individual for an office, either Congress, by direct legislation, or the President, by authority derived from Congress, can prescribe qualifications, and require that the designation shall be made out of a class of persons ascertained by proper tests to have those qualifications, and it is not necessary that the judges in the tests should be chosen by the appointing power.

Again he says:

It has been argued that a right in Congress to limit in the least the field of selection implies a right to carry on the contracting process to the designation of a particular individual. But I do not think this a fair conclusion. Congress could require that officers shall be of American citizenship, or of a certain age; that judges should be of the legal profession and of a certain standing in the profession; and still leave room to the appointing power for the exercise of its own judgment and will; and I am not prepared to affirm that, to go further, and require that the selection shall be made from persons found by an examining board to be qualified in such particulars as diligence, scholarship, integrity, good manners, and attachment to the Government, would impose an unconstitutional limitation on the appointing power. It would still have a reasonable scope for its own judgment and will. But it may be asked at what point must the contracting process stop? I confess my inability to answer. But the difficulty of drawing a line between such limitations as are, and such as are not, allowed by the Constitution, is no proof that both classes do not exist. In constitutional and legal inquiries right or wrong is often a question of degree. Yet it is impossible to tell precisely where in the scale right ceases and wrong begins. Questions of excessive bail, crue lpunishments, excessive damages, and reasonable doubts, are familiar instances. In the matter now in question it is not supposable that Congress or the President would require of candidates for office qualifications unattainable by a sufficient number to afford ample room for choice.

This question was much discussed during the administration of Mr. Johnson, but as many of the views then advanced partook more or less of party bias, I will not quote any of them here. The republicans seemed to desire to halter that President, while the democrats seemed to desire him to go unbridled. Had the politics of the President been reversed it might have had much to do in reversing the expression of the views of his friends and opponents also.

Many able statesmen and lawyers have contended that, especially in cases where Congress created an office, it could limit the Executive more or less in the appointment of a person to fill the office.

Now, sir, whether the President would or would not select and appoint these commissioners from the persons so found by the respective Legislatures to possess the qualifications, it is certain he would consider the same to be a very safe advisory board. If he made his appointments from those recommended, they would be de facto and de jure commissioners. If he disregarded the legislative recommendations of any State for good cause, it would be all right; and if he did so without cause, there would be no help till he went out of office, as there would be none as the bill now stands.

By this mode of selection, the board would be composed of members of different political parties, which would neutralize any tendency to partisan influence, and thus be safer and better. The proposed amendment also reduces the official term from six to two years. Six years is a long time. If a bad board should get into office, it would take four years to change the majority of the board under the present bill, during which time much mischief might be done. I would favor the shorter term, even if the number of the board should be, as now fixed, nine members.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this bill, amended or not amended, will become a law, and be fairly and faithfully executed. The best wishes and the great interests of millions are with the measure.

Mr. MELLISH. Mr. Speaker, the columns of the RECORD have been of late laden with voluminous and more or less luminous speeches on the subject of transportation. I do not at all aspire to be classed with the progeny of the set of men who, we are told, thought they should be heard for their much speaking, and I shall content myself with referring to but a single feature or two of the question, and one in particular that it seems to me is worthy of consideration, now that it is about to pass from the region of discussion to that of legislative action.

Members are quite right in supposing that the questions involved in this bill are vast in proportions. Perhaps some one will say that no government in modern times ever undertook such an interference with the private business affairs of the people as is proposed by this bill. But the use of the term "private business affairs" is by no means accurate; and in point of fact no government but that of the United States has ever refrained from establishing such necessary regulations as it deemed proper in regard to internal as well as external commerce.

It is claimed by the friends of this bill that it will bring the green fields of the Mississippi and Missouri five hundred miles nearer New York; and I am not prepared to deny it. Cheap transportation means cheap bread for the artisans, the workingmen, of New York and the Atlantic cities. When hundreds and thousands of them are idle, is it not time the wisdom of the country were providing some remedy for the evils which exist? Nothing will benefit New York so much as a prosperous Northwest. The Northwest sends seventeen million bushels of wheat annually through New York, and might send five times that amount in cheap breadstuffs. The Erie Canal is an everlasting witness of the benefit of cheap transportation to the city of New York. I think it might be shown that inasmuch as the people, and especially our western friends, are under the indispensable necessity of having more railroads, an indiscriminate war on railroads is not the way to get them. Really, the people want the railroads more than the railroads want the people. And if a man wants to correct his prejudices against railroads, let him go to thinking what he would do if he had the power to abolish them. Nevertheless the practices of railroads, like the practices of all selfish men and institutions, are wrong and need mending. But the true cure is not to burden and embarrass them, and render it difficult for them to live without extortion, but to regulate and control them by competition of other railroads and other means of transportation; but chiefly to punish them and correct them by operating upon the volume of their trade. Do everything to keep yourself as independent of railroads as possible, and as little as possible to make them depend upon you.

Therefore create by all the means in your power, by associations, by co-operative enterprises, by home measures, home markets for home products, and reduce as far as possible the unwise, the destructive, waste of valuable productive human labor that is thrown away unnecessarily in paying for transportation of commodities which in no instance ever added any intrinsic value to the commodity transported. The grangers of a county in Iowa, by an association of their small means, by co-operative stores, can establish a woolen factory, if you please, in the county, which will have the effect to consume at home the surplus products that otherwise would be mainly consumed in the charge of carrying them to a distant market. A county grange in Northwest Missouri, a great hemp-growing country, would be able by an aggregation of small means and the aid of reasonable credits to establish the manufacture of the raw product into merchantable commodities of such concentrated value as to render the transportation to a foreign or distant market a small per cent. upon their value. Dairy products will bear transportation many thousands of miles; but the cows from which the products are drawn would not bear transportation many hundred miles. Tobacco in its manufactured and concentrated state will bear transportation for long distances and pay, but in its crude state it will not. Cotton in the form of fine fabrics will bear transportation round the world; in the bale its value may be exhausted by carrying it half that distance. Manufacture your ore into iron; do not be so silly, so weak, as to transport long distances the ore, and the fuel and the flux which are necessary to reduce the ore to metal. And in each of these lines of enterprises when you have established your manufacture, it will consume the surplus agricultural products of a wide territory; and the cheap lands of the West, of the South, of Virginia, and other States, by such methods, will be far more valuable than are the sterile wilds of New England.

Look, for example, as an illustration of the policy hinted at, upon New England With a sterile wild and a hyperborean climate, in the intelligent industry of its population, by diversifying the application of their labor, they have been able to create a home market for home products, and have become the wealthiest population of the world per capita. Let other sections take example by it, and defend themselves against the exactions of the monopolists who transport their products by disposing of their products without transportation.

The present grows out of the past and the future will grow out of the present; and it is one of the signs of the times that all over the land the grangers have sprung up spontaneously, as of their own accord; and that great fact proves that they have a mission to perform. Possibly they may grope about, make mistakes, make war upon their friends, and sometimes, very likely, make alliances with their enemies; but in the end they will find their true mission and work out a great improvement of the condition of the agricultural population, which population is at the very foundation of the power and the greatness and the liberty and the civilization of the nation.

Although hailing from the city of New York, if brought to the confessional I do not know but I should have to admit that I was at least two-thirds a granger, and perhaps verging fast toward a full convert. I certainly sympathize with their excelsior aspiration and action, and would fain clasp hands across the continent and co-operate with them in their efforts for reform and progress. If I had a persuasive voice that could enter every lodge of the grangers, I would tell them—and it is what I meant to say in my preceding remarks—that the true remedy for their complaints will be found in a wise policy which shall foster the development of local markets for local productions and save to mankind a portion of the immense volume of productive human labor now wasted in transportation which adds nothing to the intrinsic value of the things transported.

If the grangers wish to strike a hard blow at the railroads they should go in for home markets for home productions, and thus reduce the tonnage of materials transported, and abridge the distance of the transportation, and thus save the charges of railroads. I am not prepared to fully commit myself in regard to the merits of this bill at this time.

The efforts to secure a remedy may fail at first, but its solution will finally be worked out, I have no doubt, satisfactorily to the people. And I will venture to quote, in conclusion, a few lines which seem to me applicable to the position of the grangers and other reform organizations now warring against monopolies in this country:

> The way is long, my brothers, long and rough;
> The woods are dreary, and the moors are dark;
> But he who creeps from cradle on to grave,
> Unskilled save in the velvet course of fortune,
> Hath missed the discipline of noble hearts.

Mr. OGLESBY presented a petition of the city council of the city of Rock Island, Illinois, asking the passage of Mr. COTTON's bill in relation to the Rock Island bridge; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board.

He also presented a memorial of the city council of the city of Rock Island, Illinois, opposing the proposed change of location of the military prison from Rock Island to Fort Leavenworth; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of the passage of laws to regulate freights and fares on railroads; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENSON presented a petition of citizens of Trimble County, Kentucky, praying for an amendment to the pension laws; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORTON. I present a memorial from citizens of Youngstown, in the Mahoning Valley, Ohio, and as it is short I beg leave to read it:

To the Senate of the United States:

The undersigned, owners of furnaces, rolling-mills, founderies, and coal mines in the Mahoning Valley, Ohio, employing, prior to the recent panic, several thousand hands, represent to your honorable body that the trade and business of this region especially, and as they believe of the West generally, have been stagnated and almost brought to a stand-still for the last six months, mainly for want of sufficient currency and circulating medium to carry on business and pay the operatives as needed for their families. The banks here, limited in their currency, cannot afford the necessary means and facilities for the business; the manufacturers and coalmen, with abundance of paper and property to pledge and obtain credit, cannot be accommodated here, for lack of currency in this region; and the currency East cannot readily be obtained on the paper and securities held here.

The undersigned believe that the increase of currency here in the West, by some means, is absolutely necessary at this time to save the great body of workmen and their families from distress, and the trade and business of this region from ruin and bankruptcy.

The undersigned, therefore, urgently solicit and petition your honorable body to provide some means, by the passage of a free-banking law or otherwise, as may be deemed best, to meet this most urgent necessity and afford the relief demanded.

This memorial is signed, I believe, by 51 firms: the Brier Hill Iron and Coal Company, employing 150 hands; the Girard Iron Company, 50 hands; the Mahoning Iron Company, 100 hands; the McCurdy Coal Company, 120 hands; William Richards & Sons, 225 hands; McDowell, Wick & Co., 80 hands; Wick, Struthers & Co., 80 hands; the Vienna Coal and Iron Company, 350 hands; the Church Hill Coal Company, 275 hands; the Kyle Coal Company, 110 hands; the Kine Coal Company, 125 hands; Wick, Ridgway & Co.'s Rail Mill, 550 hands; the Hinned Furnace Company, 150 hands; the Mahoning Coal Company, 550 hands; McKinnie Bank, 50; Brown, Bonnell & Co., 900; Homer, Hamilton & Co., 70; John Stambaugh, assignee of James Ward & Co., 950; Cartwright, McCurdy & Co., 175; the Eagle Furnace Company, 40; Arms, Bell & Co., 75; Wicks & Wells, 50; P. Jacobs & Son, 200; Ward, Booth & Miller, 50; Andrews Hitchcock, 400; the Burnett Coal Company, 300; the Foster Coal Company, 200; William J. Hitchcock, 50; the Andrews Coal Company, 200; C. H. & W. C. Andrews, 150; Andrews Brothers, 300; the Moore Coal Company, 50; the Pennel Coal Company, 100; the Niles Iron Company, 500; the Brookfield Coal Company, 400; Charles Herbert & Co., 100; the Niles Coal Company, 300; Arms, Wick & Co., 100; the Harroff Coal Company, 150; the Struthers Iron Company, 60; Grist & Co., 50; the Youngstown Rolling Mill Company, 105; Powers, Arms & Co., 125; the Packard Coal and Iron Company, by Henry Manning, 60. This memorial comes from Ohio. The two Senators from Ohio yesterday had not heard from Ohio on this subject. I respectfully call their attention to this memorial. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. I desire further to present, as I am instructed to do, resolutions passed at a very large meeting of citizens of Indianapolis, manufacturers, merchants, mechanics, and business men of every description. I will read the resolutions—they are very short:

1. That the recent commercial crisis, while it demonstrated the soundness of our currency and the faith of the public in its value, also demonstrated that its volume was inadequate to the actual and substantial demands of legitimate trade.

2. That in the opinion of this meeting it is the duty of Congress, as speedily as practicable, to provide for an increase of currency commensurate with the demands of the usual business of the country, and to establish such a system as will accommodate itself to the growth of our commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural interests in the future.

3. That by spasmodic and untimely efforts at resumption of specie payments the growth of our resources will be crippled and the date of real resumption will be correspondingly postponed, and we believe that legislation at this time looking to such resumption would be unwise.

4. That we approve the position of our Senators and Representatives in Congress in the objects embraced in the foregoing resolutions, and urge them to persevere until the financial relief demanded by the Northwest is obtained.

I move the reference of these resolutions to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I present seven petitions numerously signed by citizens of Illinois—I have not counted the names—praying for an increase of currency and free banking. I move their reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN presented two petitions from 164 business men and firms of the city of New York, praying that the volume of legal-tender may be fixed at $400,000,000, and for the passage of a free-banking law; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I rise to a personal explanation in connection with these memorials on the finance question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent to make a personal explanation. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I had the honor of presenting a memorial a few days since from the city of New York praying for an increase of greenbacks and for free banking. One of the city papers was pleased to question the genuineness of that petition, and perhaps indirectly to reflect upon the fact that I presented it, and impliedly that it was not genuine. I am thankful and under obligations to the New York Evening Express for my vindication, and I ask the indulgence of the Senate while I read from its columns. I read from the New York Evening Express of the 23d instant:

While Congress is preparing for action on the finances the New York merchants have not been idle. On Saturday last we noticed the fact that petitions in favor of $400,000,000 legal-tenders and free banking were being signed by many of our leading merchants. The petition which circulated among the dry-goods people received the signatures of Anthony & Hall, Garner & Co., H. B. Claflin & Co., Eldridge, Dunham & Co., W. L. Strong & Co., E. O. Tufts & Co., E. and J. S. Wright & Co., Devlin & Co., Ammidown, Lane & Co., and about one hundred and forty other leading commission, importing, and jobbing firms. The names attached to this petition represented, at a low calculation, a wealth of over $300,000,000, and probably three-quarters of the dry-goods business transacted in this city. Another petition was signed by Von Sachs & Co., Francis Skiddy, Goodwin & Co., Vatable & Son, J. M. & L. De Escoriaza, Fernandez & Calvo, Badgeley & Mead, and about seven hundred other firms, representing the grocery and hardware trades, sugar and coffee importers, and various manufacturing interests. These petitions have been sent to Washington, with a letter stating that, if necessary, a committee of leading merchants will come on and advocate the cause personally.

The public meeting called for to-morrow attracts less attention than might be expected; first, on account of the great delay in getting up the affair, and secondly, because the names of very few merchants are attached to it. Nearly all the speakers invited are politicians and lawyers, and almost every one connected with the affair is a prominent contractionist. A merchants' meeting should be composed exclusively of merchants, in order to have the proper weight with Congress. The idea of a merchants' meeting solely for the purpose of urging Congress to action was first suggested by the Express, but three weeks of valuable time has been lost in getting up the meeting, and the whole thing has been diverted from the original plan.

Mr. SCHURZ. May I ask from what paper that is?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The New York Evening Express of the 23d. Good authority, I will state to the Senator from Missouri.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of James Bordeau and Clement Lamoureaux, praying compensation for cattle and horses belonging to them taken and destroyed by the Sioux Indians at Horse Creek, Wyoming Territory, in June, 1865, reported adversely thereon; and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 558) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use funds from sale of lands for the benefit of the Osage Indians, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William and John Hannegan, contractors on the improvement of the Des Moines Rapids of the Mississippi River, praying compensation for work done on said improvement and for damages sustained by the action of Lieutenant-Colonel Wilson in suspending them from the prosecution of the work, and the seizure of their tools, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. McCREERY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 557) for the relief of the Flathead Indians, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of L. D. Evans, late collector of internal revenue for the fourth district of Texas, praying to be relieved from certain losses sustained by him, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 625) for the relief of Lemuel D. Evans, late collector of internal revenue for the fourth district of Texas.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FENTON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 552) to refund to E. and J. Koch certain customs duties, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOGY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 604) to confirm an agreement made with the Shoshone Indians (Eastern band) for the purchase of the south part of their reservation in Wyoming Territory, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOREMAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 90) for the relief of John W. Hickey, of the State of Louisiana, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HAMLIN (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 626) to amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Union Savings-Bank of the District of Columbia," approved May 24, 1870; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 627) for the relief of Gotlieb Neidhardt; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, (by request,) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 628) for the adjustment of claims under the act entitled "An act to create the office of surveyor-general of the public lands in Oregon, and to provide for the survey and to make donations to settlers of the said public lands," approved September 27, 1850; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

Mr. PRATT. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to take up some private pension bills. They have accumulated on the Calendar until they are sixteen in number, and I am extremely anxious to dispose of them. Many of them have to go to the other House. The consideration of them will not occupy more than ten or fifteen minutes. There is a report in each case. They are cases of undoubted merit, and I hope I may have the indulgence of the Senate to consider them now.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I ask the Senator to give way in order to allow me to move the consideration of a single bill.

Mr. PRATT. Certainly.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR REMOVAL OF INDIANS.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2651) reappropriating certain unexpended balances of appropriations for removal of Indians, to report it back without amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It proposes to reappropriate the unexpended balance of the appropriations made by the acts of July 15, 1870, and March 3, 1871, "for the removal of the Kickapoo and other American Indian tribes roving on the borders of Mexico and Texas to reservations within the territories of the United States, and for their settlement and subsistence on such reservations," and authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to use the unexpended balance to defray the expenses incurred by the removal of the Kickapoo Indians, locating and subsisting them in the Indian Territory; but this amount is to be in full of all expenses and obligations incurred in the removal of the Indians; and the Secretary of the Interior in disbursing the same is to see that all promises and obligations incurred by the commissioners appointed to remove the Indians shall be fully met and discharged from that amount.

The Secretary of the Interior is also authorized to expend, for the purpose of defraying expenses incurred, and to be incurred, for the removal of the Winnebago Indians in Wisconsin, from their present homes in that State to their reservation in Nebraska, and for their subsistence during such removal, and at their new homes, the unexpended balance of the sum of $36,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, which was appropriated by the sixth section of the act of May 29, 1872, for that purpose; but this amount is to be in full of all expenses and obligations incurred in the removal of those Indians; and the Secretary of the Interior, in disbursing the same, is to see that all promises and obligations incurred to the Indians shall be fully met and discharged from that amount.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHRISTIANA BAILEY.

Mr. PRATT. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 548.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 548) granting a pension to Christiana Bailey was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Christiana Bailey, widow of David Bailey, deceased, late a private in Company B, Thirteenth Regiment of West Virginia Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LUCINDA SCHRUM.

Mr. PRATT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 566.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 566) granting a pension to Lucinda Schrum, widow of Jacob R. Schrum, late of Company A, Forty-ninth Regiment Missouri Volunteers, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lucinda Schrum, widow of Jacob R. Schrum, late of Company A, Forty-ninth Regiment Missouri Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY E. NAYLOR.

Mr. PRATT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 567.

Mr. STEVENSON. I suggest to the Senator that we shall reach these bills in their order on the Calendar if we proceed with it in regular order.

Mr. PRATT. We shall not reach these cases in six weeks at the rate we are progressing, and I can get through with all of them now in ten minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 567) granting a pension to Mary E. Naylor, widow of Osborn Naylor, late a private in Company C, Second Kansas Volunteers, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HUGH P. LYTLE.

Mr. PRATT. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 568.

Mr. STEVENSON. I must object to the Senator picking out particular bills reported from his committee and passing them, when if we proceed with the Calendar they will be reached in their regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the operation of the rule a single objection prevents a bill from being taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A single objection carries it over, when taken up on the Calendar in regular order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to passing these pension bills, but Senators around me complain, and one Senator has already said that I have crowded him off by objecting to taking up bills except in their order; and it is not fair that I should not make the objection in other cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not make the objection myself, but I understand the Senator from Kentucky to object.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not make any objection; but if all these bills from the Pension Committee are to be taken up out of their order, we shall never get through with the Calendar.

Mr. PRATT. I move that the pending order be laid aside for the purpose of enabling me to call up Senate bill No. 558 for the present consideration of the Senate. I have already stated in brief my reasons. At the rate we are progressing with the Calendar we shall not get to these cases for many weeks. They are cases of undoubted merit. They have been weeded out from ten times their number. There is a report in each case, and it is important that they should be considered now. Many of these bills, most of them indeed, have got to go to the House of Representatives for consideration there. If I am not interrupted I can dispose of the twelve or thirteen that remain in that number of minutes, and we cannot, I think, economize our time any better than by disposing of them now. The Committee on Pensions is a very hard-working committee, and all that is necessary now is ten or fifteen minutes' consideration of the Senate, and then we shall have disposed of the whole of these bills and disburdened this Calendar of one-tenth of its business. I hope, therefore, that my motion to set aside the pending order and proceed to the consideration of this bill will prevail.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to make a suggestion, which I venture upon because it is a criticism of myself quite as much as of any other Senator. I violated the rule, by the indulgence of the Senate, a day or two ago in the morning hour by occupying a few moments in a discussion that perhaps might better have been omitted. But I venture to observe that if we can preserve the morning hour to the uses of the morning hour the Senator from Indiana and everybody else will be relieved; but if the morning hour, like the rest of the day, is to be devoted to financial discussions and the reading of newspaper articles and various things of that sort, which I repeat I have been guilty of doing myself—and I do not want to be understood as criticising anybody but myself—we shall have no chance of disposing of these bills. But if I shall abstain, and if other Senators will also abstain, so that we can occupy the morning hour for morning business proper, I think that would do more to advance the bills of the Senator from Indiana and the other business of the morning hour than anything else we can arrange.

Mr. BOREMAN. I wish to make an inquiry, whether it has not been the usual practice here to make an exception in favor of the Pension Committee? It has seemed to me the case since I have been here, and I think it is well to do so. Their bills are generally taken as a matter of course when reported by that committee, and they ought, it seems to me, as has been the practice, I think, to be made an exception.

Mr. STEVENSON. I did not object to the Senator from Indiana introducing his bill. I only suggested that we should go on with the Calendar; and now I withdraw even that objection.

Mr. PRATT. Thank you.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SARGENT. Is this bill now reported, or on the Calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been heretofore reported, and is on the Calendar.

Mr. SARGENT. It seems to me the only way we can proceed and make any progress with the Calendar is to take up cases and dispose of them in their order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object?

Mr. SARGENT. I do object.

Mr. PRATT. Then I move to postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have not objected, and I should not object; but if I have to vote upon this question I shall vote to go on with the Calendar in order. What the Senator from Indiana says is undoubtedly true, but it is equally true that all the bills on the Calendar have gone through the consideration of committees. There are bills there which have been considered by the Naval Committee, which involve a great deal of public interest, and a great deal of private interest, where wrongs have been sustained which the Senate will be prompt to redress as soon as they can reach them. Now, if we take out all the pension bills, my friend from Indiana loses his interest in the Calendar entirely; and if we are to allow him to come in and take out all his bills, then he will be willing that the morning hour shall be devoted to almost anything but the Calendar. I know from long experience that we shall get along better, and that the Senator from Indiana will ultimately fare quite as well, if we take up the Calendar in its order, and go on with the unobjected bills. All his bills are unobjected, and are sure to pass as soon as they are reached. While I have not objected to his request, I shall vote for the Calendar.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will avail myself of this opportunity to second several suggestions which have been made on one side and the other about the importance of adhering to the rules governing the morning hour, and to admonish the Chair, that I think it is obviously the imperative duty of the Chair to hold the Senate to the rules governing the morning hour. I take this occasion, as there is nothing now before the Senate, to say that I will endeavor to call attention to any breaches of those rules that occur to me during the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say on that subject that he has departed from the rule only in favor of discussion upon the financial question, which stands no chance of being debated except in the morning hour, and the Chair has therefore relaxed the rule upon that subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. PRATT. But for the objection raised we should have been through with my little pension bills by this time. They are all of them unobjected cases, and in that fact consists the merit of my motion to proceed to consider them now. In the regular call of the docket we shall not reach the last case reported by the Committee on Pensions for six weeks or two months to come. There are one-third of the Senators on this floor who are interested in those bills. There is a printed report in each case; there is no doubt about their merit; and we can get through with the whole lot in the course of ten minutes if I am not interrupted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 568) granting a pension to Hugh P. Lytle, late a private in Company H, Thirty-second Regiment Ohio Volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY B. RYDER.

Mr. PRATT. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1954) granting a pension to Henry B. Ryder.

Mr. SARGENT. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California objects.

Mr. PRATT. I move, then, that the pending order be postponed and the bill considered.

Mr. SARGENT. If by vote of the Senate some special time could be assigned to the business of this committee, I should have no objection, and would vote for it; and I am willing to extend the same favor to any other committee that has important business before the Senate. That has been, I understand, the course of the Senate heretofore. Certainly this irruption into the morning hour is extremely irregular. Several of us who have heretofore asked that important bills might be taken up which would lead to no discussion have had objection made, and have cheerfully yielded to the objection that we would reach them in the regular course of the Calendar. Unquestionably, to the amiable Senator from Indiana this business is the most important before the Senate. Others of us see reason to differ with that opinion, and to think that other business which is on the Calendar, and which will be reached in the regular order of business first, is of equal if not greater importance than that insisted on by him.

Now, sir, if this example is to be set; if the regular order is to be broken up each morning; if we are to take up things irregularly on the suggestion of a single Senator, it seems to me that the understanding or vote of the Senate by which we were to take up the bills on the Calendar in their order which are not objected to is done away with. It seems to me it would be better for us now, instead of proceeding in this, which is certainly an irregular manner, to proceed with the Calendar; and upon this question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boreman, Chandler, Conover, Cragin, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Texas, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Schurz, Scott, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Buckingham, Conkling, Cooper, Dennis, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hitchcock, Howe, Kelly, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Sargent, Sherman, Stevenson, and Stewart—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Davis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Harvey, Jones, Norwood, Patterson, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Spencer, Sprague, Stockton, Thurman, and Tipton—27.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1954) granting a pension to Henry B. Ryder. The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry B. Ryder, late second lieutenant in the Cameron Dragoons, afterward changed to the Fifth Pennsylvania Cavalry, and to pay him a pension as second lieutenant from and after the passage of the act.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. J. D. YOUNG in the House of Representatives on the 13th of February:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 783) granting a pension to Henry B. Ryder, having considered the same, submit the following report:

Henry B. Ryder, the applicant, entered the service of the United States as a second lieutenant in the Cameron Dragoons, afterward changed to the Fifth Pennsylvania Cavalry, in July, 1861. The evidence also shows that he failed to be mustered through no neglect of his own, and that after being in the service several months, or about September, 1861, he was wounded while on the picket line in the night by a part of Colonel Baxter's regiment, who fired upon the picket line thinking they were the enemy. From the effects of the wound in the neck and typhoid fever the soldier had to undergo a most wonderful surgical operation, being the insertion of a silver tube into the trachea, which was inserted after tracheotomy, performed by the surgeons of Saint Luke's Hospital, New York City.

His treatment, as is shown by a copy of the record from the hospital, extended from November 28, 1861, to July 28, 1862; and many times during his treatment at the hospital, he being seized with fits of coughing, the tube had to be removed and the throat cleared by an operation of the surgeon.

The applicant now breathes through this tube, and, as the medical evidence shows, his life is in constant danger, and he requires constant medical treatment.

The facts as stated being sustained by abundant proof, and the service being shown by affidavits of his officers and others, your committee are unanimously of the opinion that the case is a meritorious one, and that the applicant should receive the pension due him; and we therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill as a substitute for the one under consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARTHA E. NORTHUP.

Mr. PRATT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1122) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha E. Northup, widow of First Lieutenant Edward B. Northup, late of the Seventeenth United States Infantry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be taken up if there be no objection.

Mr. SARGENT. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Martha E. Northup, widow of First Lieutenant Edward B. Northup, late of the Seventeenth United States Infantry, and to pay her a pension of seventeen dollars per month, commencing March 4, 1873, during her widowhood.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to hear the report in that case.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. PRATT on the 19th instant:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1122) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha E. Northup, submit the following report:

She is the widow of First Lieutenant Edward B. Northup, of the Seventeenth United States Infantry, whose miliary record, as furnished by the Adjutant-General, is as follows:

He was discharged as a corporal on surgeon's certificate of disability October 11, 1862, because of an accidental wound in the finger of the left hand, (received July 3, 1862,) and from a severe attack of erysipelas, which destroyed the use of the hand.

Appointed second lieutenant Veteran Reserve Corps August 8, 1863, and first lieutenant March 26, 1865. Assigned to the Fourteenth Regiment Veteran Reserve Corps, and served therewith and in the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands until mustered out, November 8, 1866.

REGULAR ARMY RECORD.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

The occasion of the death of Lieutenant Northup is furnished in a certified copy of the coroner's inquest held over his dead body at Sioux City, Iowa, on the 5th day of March, 1873, which is as follows;

STATE OF IOWA, Woodbury County, ss:

At an inquest held upon the body of Lieutenant E. B. Northup, of the Seventeenth United States Infantry, on the 4th and 5th days of March, 1873, before J. J. Saville, coroner in and for said county, whose body is now here lying dead, by the jurors whose names are hereunto subscribed the said jurors on their oaths do say as follows, to wit:

We, the jury, find that Lieutenant E. B. Northup, of the Seventeenth United States Infantry, died at the Depot Hotel, in the city of Sioux City, State of Iowa, on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1873, at or about three o'clock p. m., from the effects of an overdose of chloral hydrate, administered by himself, without criminal intent, during the temporary absence of his nurse, while in a state of great mental and nervous prostration, brought on by the excessive use of intoxicating liquors.

In testimony whereof we have hereto set our hands at the city of Sioux City, in the State of Iowa, this 5th day of March, A. D. 1873.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE, January 28, 1874.

There is no proof accompanying the bill except the papers set out above, if we leave out of consideration private letters. The officer fell by his own hand, not with a criminal intent, says the inquest, but in a frame of mind induced by the excessive use of intoxicating liquors. We have no desire to add a word to what this document affirms, but it cannot be said he was in the line of duty in the intemperate use of stimulating drinks. On the contrary, he violated the rules of the service and exposed himself to punishment. His death, under the circumstances, cannot be ascribed to any disability incurred while in the service. His honorable wounds did not contribute to it. To grant relief to his widow under the circumstances tends to relax the rule against drunkenness in the Army, a crime in the private soldier and a greater one in the officer, who should set an example of sobriety to the men under his charge.

Still, the majority of the committee, in view of the excellent record of this young soldier, and of the further fact that he was not a habitual drinker, and because he has left a widow wholly destitute of the means of support, have agreed to recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I think this report shows the necessity of some further deliberation in these cases than the system which the Senate at present is pursuing seems to afford. The report which has just been read shows that the person who died and whose widow is to be placed on the pension-roll did not die in the line of duty, did not die on account of any wounds received in the service, but that he died in a fit of delirium tremens, which in itself was an offense against the service in which he was engaged; and the committee themselves most inconclusively reason, from premises which exclude such conclusion, that perhaps on the whole, as the widow is destitute, a pension ought to be granted to her. Now I will read, for the sake of emphasizing them a little more, that which the committee themselves report as the facts in this case; and I should like to have the chairman of the committee justify the proposition which he made that this bill should be passed through by a reading of little more than its title, without a statement of the facts in the case and without calling the attention of the Senate to them. The report says:

There is no proof accompanying the bill except the papers set out above, if we leave out of consideration private letters. The officer fell by his own hand, not with a criminal intent, says the inquest, but in a frame of mind induced by the excessive use of intoxicating liquors. We have no desire to add a word to what this document affirms, but it cannot be said he was in the line of duty in the intemperate use of stimulating drinks. On the contrary, he violated the rules of the service and exposed himself to punishment.

By violating the rules of the service, and thereby exposing himself to punishment, he brought on his death in a fit of delirium tremens; and it is proposed because the widow is poor that she shall receive a pension. They say further:

His death, under the circumstances, cannot be ascribed to any disability incurred while in the service. His honorable wounds did not contribute to it. To grant relief to his widow under the circumstances tends to relax the rule against drunkenness in the Army, a crime in the private soldier and a greater one in the officer, who should set an example of sobriety to the men under his charge.

Mr. CONKLING. What was his rank?

Mr. SARGENT. He was a lieutenant.

Now, after so strongly stating that to grant a pension in this case would be to relax the rules of the service and to encourage drunkenness in the Army, the committee come in and propose that a pension shall be granted; and this is to be done, and these bills are to be passed at the rate of one a minute, as stated by the chairman of the committee. In twelve minutes he was to dispose of twelve bills, without reading the reports, without stating the facts, without informing the Senate that we were called upon to vote to do that which would destroy the Army, which would encourage drunkenness in the service, which would relax discipline, without calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that this man did not die from wounds, did not die in the discharge of duty, but died while violating the rules of the service and thereby meriting punishment. Here is what they say:

Still the majority of the committee, in view of the excellent record of this young soldier, and of the further fact that he was not a habitual drinker, and because he has left a widow wholly destitute of the means of support, have agreed to recommend the passage of the bill.

Of course, the destitution of the widow may be a matter appealing to our sympathies; but are there not hundreds of destitute widows in this very city who appeal to our sympathies and to our charities? Is there a Senator who passes a week without being called upon, and without yielding to the call, to furnish money out of his own private means for the cases of distress which are all around us? That in itself is not exceptional, and does not entitle this party to a pension, and certainly the policy of the general law is not that where a person dies, not through wounds received in the service, not by exposure in the service, but simply dies while in the service, his widow or heirs shall receive a pension. It seems to me if this is the character of the cases which we are now passing through so rapidly, this is not the manner in which they should be passed through, and I pause in order that the committee may explain the wide divergence between the premises which they lay down, and the recommendation which they make to the Senate in this case.

Mr. PRATT. I believe this is the only case reported by the committee on which they were not unanimous, or nearly so, and the honorable Senator from California will do the committee the justice to say that they have spread all the unfavorable facts before the Senate for its judgment.

Now, what induced the committee to recommend the passage of this bill was the fact that, for his age, there was no more gallant officer in the service than this Lieutenant Northup. He was covered with wounds incurred in the service of his country. His brother officers who had lost limbs in the service came before the committee and testified generously in his behalf, that this was an exceptional case in this young man's career; that he had been ordered off to distant service in the Territories, and stopping temporarily at Sioux City, he imbibed too much, and under the influence of liquor he was prostrated, and in the absence of his nurse had taken the medicine which produced his death. He was not a habitual drinker; nothing of the kind; but upon this occasion he got upon a spree and he took this medicine in excess, in the absence of his nurse, and thus fell by his own hand. That was the judgment of the jury of inquest that sat upon his case; and there was not a particle of evidence contradicting this. On the other hand, his military record is set forth in this report. The testimony of his brother officers was that, for his age, there was no one who had more distinguished himself in the service, no one who was more entitled to the gratitude of his countrymen, than this young lieutenant; and the majority of the committee, under the influence of these considerations and in behalf of the widow, concluded to report this House bill in her favor.

My friend on my right [Mr. OGLESBY] took a warm interest in this case, and he can explain it perhaps more fully than I have done.

Mr. OGLESBY. Unless the morning hour has expired, I will speak for a few moments upon this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has just a minute and a half within the morning hour.

Mr. OGLESBY. The committee when this bill was presented to them took up the case expecting to report against it, and in that sense the report appears here before the Senate. Subsequently, on a rehearing, with the evidence of two living witnesses before us that this lieutenant had risen from the ranks in the volunteer service, that he had served four or five years in the volunteers and then entered the regular Army, and had risen to a lieutenancy there; that he had some four or five wounds received in various battles, and distinguished himself on all occasions, we reconsidered the case. The committee had nothing but the report of that coroner's inquest, and the coroner's inquest had nothing before them except a one-sided case. The lieutenant had no friend at Sioux City, not a living being to speak for him after his death; and the coroner's inquest sat upon the case and took the eviden e they gathered up at the hotel, that he had been intoxicated there, and while intoxicated took an overdose of chloral and died in the absence of his nurse. So the report of the coroner's inquest was presented to us and nothing else, and upon that the committee proceeded to make an adverse report. The witnesses, who were familiar with his record, who had served in the same regiment with him, came before the committee and testified, and gave us the full facts of the case and his character. They testified that he was in the full line of his duty at the time of his death.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois will suspend. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President——

Mr. PRATT. I ask for the postponement of the pending measure until we can take a vote on this bill. I hope the Senator from California, after hearing these explanations, will withdraw his objection.

Mr. SARGENT. I have not any objection to withdraw. The objection was overruled by a vote of the Senate, and of course I cheerfully acquiesced. I was simply calling attention to the character of the bill and the doubtful report made in its favor. I am willing that a vote shall be taken, and have nothing further to say upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks that the regular order be laid aside informally with a view of disposing of the bill pending at the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope that will be done. I am satisfied we shall transact no business in the Senate until we can get rid of my friend's pension bills; and inasmuch as he has the power to take up his business on the Calendar to the exclusion of others, I am going to ask him, when he gets through, to move to take up three or four bills of mine, which I think quite as important as those which have been passed, and I dare say if I vote with him now he will reciprocate by moving to take up these bills of mine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection the unfinished business will be laid aside informally and the Senate will proceed with the consideration of the pension bill.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I wish to say a very few words regarding this case.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I think we had better let it go over.

Mr. ANTHONY. O, no; we had better go on and finish it.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I do not think this bill ought to pass. I think I can give good reasons why it should not be passed, in a very brief space of time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the circumstances, I trust the Senator from Indiana will let his bill go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio object?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understood the Senator from Indiana to move to postpone the pending and all prior orders in order to proceed with pension bills. I shall vote with him if he makes that motion.

Mr. PRATT. I do; I think we had better go on and dispose of this little bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Indiana says that he moves to postpone the pending and all prior orders in order to proceed with these pension bills, and I shall vote with him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana make that motion?

Mr. PRATT. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEWART. I will ask——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the question. The Senator from Indiana moves to postpone the present and all prior orders and proceed with the pension bill which was under consideration at the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. STEWART. I move that until otherwise ordered the morning hour be extended to half-past one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is out of order.

Mr. SCHURZ. I desire to know whether I have the floor. I think I was awarded the floor.

Mr. STEWART. I give notice that I will make the motion I have just stated to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A resolution to that effect has been introduced and referred to the Committee on Rules, but has not yet been reported.

Mr. STEWART. Part of the committee have gone away, and we may not get a report in time to act upon it for some days to come.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves to postpone the pending and all prior orders and proceed with the consideration of the bill under discussion at the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope that will not be done. It is manifest this little bill will give rise to considerable debate. I trust that by unanimous consent, and without debating any other bill, we shall proceed with the finance question and dispose of it. I trust, therefore, that the Senator from Indiana will withdraw his motion. If he does not, I shall feel it my duty to call for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. PRATT. In consideration of the fact that the Senate has been very liberal to me this morning, I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn. The unfinished business of yesterday is now before the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 583) making an appropriation to defray the expenses of the Joint Select Committee to Inquire into the Affairs of the District of Columbia; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

CURRENCY AND BANKING.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 617) to provide for the redemption and reissue of United States notes, and for free banking.

Mr. SCHURZ. I rise to offer an amendment to the first section of the pending bill. I move to amend by striking out in the fourth line of the first section "382," and inserting "356;" so that the section will read:

That the maximum limit of United States notes is hereby fixed at $356,000,000, at which amount it shall remain until reduced as hereinafter provided.

Mr. BOGY. Before my colleague proceeds, I wish to ask the Chair whether it is in order to move an amendment to the amendment of my colleague?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. BOGY. I move, then, to insert $400,000,000 in lieu of $356,000,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri is, the Chair understands, an amendment to the bill itself, and not to the amendment of his colleague; and therefore it will not be in order until the amendment of his colleague is disposed of.

Mr. BOGY. My object is to bring the Senate to a vote on the limit of $400,000,000 instead of $356,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that we take the vote first on the $356,000,000, and then the Senator can offer his amendment for $400,000,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Missouri that he can effect his purpose by moving to amend the amendment of his colleague and not the bill.

Mr. BOGY. That is my motion; to amend the amendment of my colleague by striking out "$356,000,000" and inserting "$400,000,000."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first amendment proposed is to strike out $382,000,000 and insert $356,000,000; and it is now proposed to amend the amendment by striking out $356,000,000 and inserting $400,000,000.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suppose that an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri farthest from me [Mr. BOGY] would not now be in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would not.

Mr. WRIGHT. But I give notice now that I propose to offer this amendment as a substitute for the first section, and I submit to my friend from Missouri whether he will not accept it in the place of the amendment that he has just offered, and thereby have it become the pending question. My proposition is to strike out all the section and insert:

That the amount of United States notes for circulation is hereby fixed at $400,000,000.

Mr. SCHURZ. I think it will be just as well to offer all these amendments after I am through.

Mr. BOGY. If the Senator from Iowa will explain the effect of his amendment, and wherein it differs from mine, I may accept it.

Mr. SCHURZ. I suggest that I be permitted to get through with my remarks, which will occupy only a few minutes; and then the arrangement between the two Senators may be settled. It is not at all in unkindness to my colleague that I make this suggestion, but I think it will promote progress of business.

Mr. BOGY. I am willing to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri withdraws his amendment to the amendment, and accepts that offered by the Senator from Iowa, which will now be reported.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is a process which cannot be got through with here without the consent of the Senator from Missouri on my right, [Mr. SCHURZ,] who proposes to perfect, as it is called, the first section of the bill. You cannot move to strike out the section until the motion is first put on the amendment which he has offered to perfect it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is well taken. The motion is not in order at the present time.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President, I desire to make a very few remarks, merely to state the opinion which I entertain.

The first section of the bill as reported from the Committee on Finance can stand, if at all, only upon two grounds:

First, that the issue of United States notes beyond the limit of $356,000,000 was legal; in other words, that the $44,000,000 United States notes retired and canceled under the act of 1866 did form a reserve to be uncanceled and to be reissued again by the Secretary of the Treasury at his own sovereign discretion. It is my deliberate opinion that the Secretary of the Treasury had no such legal discretion, and that the reissue of any of the United States notes retired and canceled under the act of 1866 was not warranted by law. I wish to have it distinctly understood that I do not intend to make this a personal matter at all. I do not mean to wage war upon any public officer. I am willing to admit that the Secretary of the Treasury, in reissuing part of the $44,000,000 reserve, acted in perfect good faith according to his own understanding of the law; and I am also willing to accept any possible excuse which, in that respect, can be made for him. But that does not alter my opinion of the law itself.

The act of 1866 provided—

That of the United States notes not more than $10,000,000 may be retired and canceled within six months from the passage of this act, and thereafter not more than $4,000,000 in any one month.

And, in accordance with that act, the Secretary of the Treasury continued to reduce the amount in circulation until $44,000,000 had been retired and canceled.

Then, in 1868, by the act of the 4th of February, Congress provided that—

From and after the passage of this act the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to make any reduction of the currency by retiring or canceling United States notes shall be, and is hereby, suspended; but nothing herein contained shall prevent the cancellation and destruction of mutilated United States notes and the replacing of the same with notes of the same character and amount.

It is perfectly clear to my mind that the reduction and cancellation of the $44,000,000 which were retired by Secretary McCulloch was considered final, and that the last clause of the act of 1868, providing for the replacement of mutilated United States notes which had been canceled and destroyed by new notes of the same character and amount, excludes the idea that the forty-four millions retired and canceled might also be so replaced. If it had been intended that the $44,000,000 then retired and canceled might be uncanceled again and reissued, by virtue of the act of 1868, I have not the remotest doubt in the world that the act would have so stated in explicit language. And this conviction which I have arrived at is only strengthened by my reading of the debate which preceded the passage of the act. I know that doubt was expressed by some Senators as to whether the language of the act was sufficiently explicit and clear to leave no room at all for the interpretation that the $44,000,000 might be issued again; but it is also certain, and I think no man can read the debate preceding the passage of that act without coming to the same conclusion, that amendments designed to prevent such a misconstruction, to render such a misinterpretation impossible, were voted down by a considerable majority, expressly upon the ground that such amendments were absolutely unnecessary, the language of the act itself being so clear that there could be no two opinions about it. I quoted the other day from the words employed by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] who said he was opposed to such amendments because he was firmly convinced that the language of the act itself did not admit of any other interpretation, but that the retirement of the $44,000,000 was conclusive and final, and that a reissue was inadmissible under the law. While there was a difference of opinion as to the safety of the wording of the act, there was a perfectly unanimous understanding as to the intendment and purpose which the act was to subserve, namely, that the $44,000,000 were to be finally destroyed, never to be reissued. Such was the universal understanding at the time, and that understanding was by no means dissented from by those who offered amendments to the act of 1868, in order to "make assurance double sure."

The first section of this bill, therefore, can in my opinion not stand upon the ground that the reissue of any part of the $44,000,000 retired and canceled under the act of 1866 was legal. It is my conviction that it was not.

It might be put upon a second ground, namely, that by subsequent legislation the issue of the $44,000,000, or any part thereof, might be legalized, if it was not warranted by law before. Now, sir, let us see what that would imply. It would be equivalent to a new issue of Government paper money. Such action could be based only on the principle that the Government of the United States in times of profound peace, with no public danger urging upon it extreme necessities and forcing it to resort to exceptional measures, may at any time issue any amount of irredeemable paper money it pleases—a power which would put at the mercy of that Government the private fortunes of all the citizens of the United States.

Mr. President, in my opinion that power does not constitutionally belong to the Government of the United States, and I, for my part, shall never contribute my vote to sanction it. Those who vote for any proposition to put the legal limit to the issue of United States notes up to a figure over and above three hundred and fifty-six millions, the maximum limit at which it stood when the law of 1868 was passed, must therefore either recognize that in spite of the language of the law, and in spite of the general understanding as to the intendment of the law, the forty-four millions legally retired and canceled could be legally uncanceled again and reissued, or they must admit that the Government of the United States in times of profound peace, not acting under any pressure of great public danger and necessity, may issue whatever amount of irredeemable paper money it pleases, and thus virtually dispose of all private fortunes.

Mr. President, my conscientious conviction, my sense of duty, tells me that I can assent to neither of these two propositions; and for this reason I propose my amendment. I repeat, sir, that I do not mean to make any attack upon the Secretary of the Treasury, and am willing to admit the most favorable construction of his acts; but I would submit to the Senate that here something more is at stake than the mere question of issuing more or less paper money. Here is a question of law, of constitutional power, which involves the best interests and the fortunes of the American people.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, two propositions have been made to the Senate to depart from the text of the bill presented by the chairman of the Committee on Finance: one proposing to keep the volume of Treasury notes at the maximum of $356,000,000, the other to increase it to $400,000,000. The decision of this question at this time I consider scarcely second in importance to any that has ever been brought before the Congress of the United States, and it illustrates to me how, under the influence of the excitement and emergencies of the hour, men's minds and judgments drift away from those sound conclusions which serenity and peace tend so much to produce, and how important it is in the government of a great country that stability in its laws should be considered as one of the conditions under which they are enacted. Surely, Mr. President, there can be no duty more imperatively reposed in a government, no matter what may be its form, than that of providing a stable standard of value for the transactions of its citizens. It is not only a duty intrusted to the Congress of the United States, but it is a duty which they cannot conscientiously neglect the performance of. They are bound to execute it, or they fall short of one of the primary and fundamental duties of those charged with the execution of government. When the States who formed the Federal Constitution met by their delegates in convention and agreed upon the creation of a government, and established its constitution by a written charter, among the necessary powers to be reposed in that government was that of coining money. And I ask the Senate to observe that when in this language they gave power to Congress and imposed upon Congress the duty of creating a standard of value, they did it in the same clause which empowered them to fix the standard of weights and measures. The two subjects are entirely cognate. The two subjects are part and parcel of each other. A community without a standard of weights and measures would have nothing to regulate their bargains, would have nothing to control and insure the honest dealings of men. There must be a measurement by the yard, or foot, or inch. There must be the measurement of capacity. There must be the measurement of weight. There must be a standard for all these things; otherwise there could be no certainty in men's transactions. This is essential.

What would the common sense of the plainest man in this country consider of a proposition that we should abolish our standard of weights and measures; that the cord of wood should not be of its proper measurement; that the yard-stick should not contain its thirty-six inches, or the foot its twelve, or the quart measure its two pints, and so on throughout? The man who proposed it would be thought to be either a public enemy or an idiot. Men would laugh in his face, and he would be ridiculed deservedly. And yet, Mr. President, what is the effect of obliterating your standard of value? The standard of value lies underneath every other standard, as much as the foundation-stones of this Capitol sustain its columns. The standard of value is the first foundation of a nation's polity; there it must exist. The first step cannot be taken in framing a political society unless a standard of value shall be created by the sovereign authority.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I should like to have him define what he means by a standard of value.

Mr. BAYARD. I will state that presently. The standard of value is a fixed amount of value which shall not change, which shall consist by the consent of the world of that which is not liable to deterioration or change as other commodities are. For this reason, the metals of gold and silver have, by the common consent of mankind, formed the basis of the standard of value; and gold and silver are by the laws of the world, by the consent of all societies, the equivalents for all human debts.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Do I understand the Senator to mean that the value of coin does not change?

Mr. BAYARD. There is nothing human that does not change. But the reason why gold and silver have been fixed as the standard for regulating human values is, that they are less susceptible of change than any other commodity known to mankind.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. But they do change.

Mr. BAYARD. So imperceptibly as not to interfere with that stability which is essential to all human intercourse.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I have sometimes known a dollar to buy a bushel of wheat; and at other times I have known two dollars to be required to buy a bushel of wheat.

Mr. BAYARD. Then it seems to me the Senator's wheat has changed and not the dollar.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I wanted to inquire whether the stability was in the coin or in the wheat.

Mr. BAYARD. The stability is in the value of the coin, the fineness at which it is established by law. The weight and fineness are established; it is declared that the dollar of the United States, whether of silver or of gold, shall contain a certain fineness and a certain weight of metal. Gold of that fineness and that weight is a common denominator for property all over this world.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. The law also determines that the bushel of wheat shall contain thirty-one hundred and fifty cubic inches. It makes that the standard of a bushel just as clearly as it makes gold the measure of the value of coin. But, notwithstanding that, the dollar or the wheat changes very materially. I want to know which is the standard, whether it is the wheat or the coin? I want to know which is Daniel and which is the lion, [laughter;] which carries the umbrella—the coin or the wheat? [Laughter.]

Mr. BAYARD. The scriptural figure of my friend can scarcely be carried out in a discussion of this kind. He spoke of a standard of weights and measures; I spoke of a standard of value. The Senator has asked me in regard to a bushel. That is a standard of measure. I tell him that the bushel of wheat cannot be a standard of value. If it had been fit for it, it is probable that by this time the world's experience would have fastened upon that as a proper basis for their exchanges; but it is not a standard of value, but a mere measurement adopted in different countries according to their requirements, I answer him that the standard of value must be that which the world's experience has accepted as the basis, and that is the precious metals.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I do not know that I shall dispute that position of the honorable Senator; and yet it is very difficult for me to see which is held as the standard, the wheat or the coin. I will attribute it to my own ignorance, however, and not to the Senator's inability to explain it.

Mr. BAYARD. Well, Mr. President, perhaps there is confusion in my honorable friend's mind—I do not say there is; it may be in mine, and not in his—in attempting to consider standards of value and standards of measure as one and the same thing. I was merely stating the fact that standards are necessary of weight or measurement, and beyond that the standard of value is essential because value lies underneath all others. Without a standard of value there can be no transactions between men of a reliable character, unless a mere exchange in specie. The requirements of mankind have made a common denominator for all other property necessary to be established, and the experience of mankind has designated gold and silver as the common denominator, and they have become by the consent of civilized men the standard of value of human transactions.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I agree with the honorable Senator that the civilized world has determined that gold and silver shall be the standard of value, but I do not think that the entire civilized world has been able to hold either gold or silver at a particular fixed value. I will not interrupt the Senator further, however.

Mr. BAYARD. I am so desirous to respond respectfully to any suggestions of my friend from Connecticut that I do not wish to quit the point that he has been discussing without answering him, not only to my own satisfaction, but endeavoring to make the answer to his satisfaction. If he will allow me to read from the decision of the Supreme Court to be found in 12 Wallace, perhaps I can find in the language of another a better explanation than I have been able to give in my own.

In considering this question—

we assume as a fundamental proposition that it is the duty of every government to establish a standard of value. The necessity of standard is indeed universally acknowledged. Without it the transactions of society would become impossible. All measures, whether of extent, or weight, or value, must have certain proportions of that which they are intended to measure. The unit of extent must have certain definite length, the unit of weight certain definite gravity, and the unit of value certain definite value. These units, multiplied or subdivided, supply the standards by which all measures are properly made. The selection, therefore, by the common consent of all nations, of gold and silver as the standard of value was natural, or, more correctly speaking, inevitable. For whatever definitions ofe valu political economists may have given, they all agree that gold and silver have more value in proportion to weight and size, and are less subject to loss by wear or abrasion, than any other material capable of easy subdivision and impression, and that their value changes less and by slower degrees, through considerable periods of time, than that of any other substance which could be used for the same purpose. And these are qualities indispensable to the convenient use of the standard required.

I have here also a definition from an exceedingly intelligent writer upon political economy, Mr. Macdonell, which perhaps I might also read to the Senator to show him what is meant by a standard of value, and why I said that the precious metals were admittedly the only proper standard of value:

Gold, silver, and copper possess certain properties which mark them out to be the cosmopolitan currency; it is not caprice frozen into convention, or the stamp of the mint, that has gained for them their present place; and Turgot says well, "Gold and silver are constituted, by the nature of things, money, and universal money, independently of all convention and law." They contain much value in small bulk, they are similar in quality wherever they are produced; they are indestructible; they are readily divisible, and yet do not suffer in beauty by division; and they are readily united. They are so scattered over the globe that the same expenditure of labor has, in the past at all events, generally produced about the same amount of metal, and being at once the most generally diffused and the rarest of metals, they are marked out by nature for coinage.

Now, sir, I have answered in my own way, lamely at first and subsequently by definitions which I think will be accepted as authority, the question of the honorable Senator as to what I meant by a standard of value; and, to go back now to what I started to say, why I considered the very foundation-stone of a government's duty to be the creation of a stable standard of value; and when our forefathers, to whom was committed the formation of the Government under which we live, and which it is our duty to maintain in the spirit and the purity with which they transmitted it to us, gave to the Congress of the United States the power "to coin money and regulate the value thereof," they gave it the power, and imposed with the power the duty, of creating a standard of value, and with it they coupled the correlative duty of fixing the standard of weights and measures. It is as false a piece of political economy, it is as unjust and injurious, yea, even more so, for the government of a country from time to time to unfix its standard of weights and measures as it is to unfix its standard of values.

The Government of the United States have fixed a standard of value. In pursuance of their duty, among the earliest statutes of this Government were statutes fixing the fineness of their metallic coins. The variation in those standards has been exceedingly slight in the whole history of our Government, and has generally consisted in the adaptation of the denomination of the coin to the exigencies of trade rather than in the alteration of its standard. It is now about the same that it was in 1789. The British government have shown their appreciation of the necessity of stability by never altering their standard of coin from the third year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth until the present time, although at times, under some such temporary excitement and supposed necessity as that which seems to coerce the minds of gentlemen in both Houses of Congress at present, attempts have been made to shift the value of the sterling coin, but unsuccessfully.

Mr. President, the progress on the downward path is gradual but certain; and men would oftentimes be alarmed to look back and see the progress they had made in the wrong direction, in a direction in which they never could have contemplated progressing had they considered all its effects. Upon no subject has the experience of mankind been more uniform than in respect to the attempt to abolish from money all intrinsic value. There have been periods in the history of the world in which the legitimate uses of credit, combined with the intrinsic values of money, have not been perhaps so well understood as they may be now. There is a high and a grand duty which credit can perform, and a money of credit can perform conjunctively with a money of intrinsic value; but it is not in the power of any man in this Chamber to exhibit to the Senate a case where money, having been divorced from intrinsic value, has been able to sustain itself from depreciation, and in the end has not been the ruin and bankruptcy of the community that embarked upon it.

At times all sorts of methods have been resorted to in order to escape from these laws of nature and to destroy these standards of value. The best illustration of that has been the efforts of alchemists, who for centuries wasted the public purses of empires, and the private purses of kings and of others in authority, in the vain hope of seeking to transmute the baser metals into gold and silver, so as to unlock by human skill one of the great secrets of nature. But all such attempts have been fruitless. They have all ended in mockery, disaster, and unhappiness, until now alchemy is but another name for delusion.

The same principle precisely has been applied in the attempt to make that which has no value intrinsically—I mean paper or like material—pass as money and become the representative of value in communities. Where it has been used conjunctively with money of value and has been made convertible into money of value, there, when used with precaution and care, it has been sustained to the benefit of the community that used it. Where, as I say, it has been attempted to carry on the business of a community by virtue of money without value intrinsically, and based solely upon credit, ruin and disaster have been the invariable result. And this is human experience in all countries, not simply in the densely populated countries of Europe, but just as much in the thinly populated countries of America. The history was just the same in France, it was just the same in Russia and in Austria, as it was in the State of Texas. The illustration of her history of paper money was admirably given the other day by Mr. Wells, of New York, in an article contributed to one of the reviews, taken mainly from a book, unfortunately too much forgotten, which has been suffered to pass out of print, the History of Paper Money, by Mr. William M. Gouge, of Pennsylvania.

There can be no doubt that what I have been stating would have been accepted as mere truisms even ten short years ago. Yes, sir; even eight short years ago there was no one to deny it. All men accepted it. In the middle of the war there was a terrific emergency, before which the convictions and judgments of men wavered, and they fell. An illustration of that can be found in the progress of his unwilling assent to the false proposition that a nation may, even for a moment, abolish its standard of value from the dealings of its citizens, without coming to loss and trouble as a consequence, in the recorded judgments, official papers, and opinions of the late Chief Justice Chase. There are few things more instructive, there are few things more honorable to human nature, than the history of his temporary fall from his acknowledged judgment, until his recantation of that which he admitted to be a heresy and a mistake. In the admission by the Chief Justice of the error that he committed during the war under the pressure of excitement, in the midst of turmoil, there was, in my opinion, an exhibition of self-abnegation and of a lofty sense of rectitude that has not often been surpassed in the annals of our race. He admitted the error, and his duty to rectify that error as soon as possible.

Now, Mr. President, what I mean to say is, that at the close of the war, in 1866, the opinions that I have just been expressing were the common opinions of the people of the United States and of the Congress of the United States. No one expressed them more frequently than the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] Nay, they were maintained even by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] who has been standing in the front rank of those seeking for further inflation, who are seeking to pronounce a renewed decree of banishment of gold and silver coin from our midst; for that is what this bill means, whether you fix the currency at $382,000,000 or $400,000,000. Anything that increases the issue of irredeemable paper money at this time is nothing but a renewed decree of banishment of the standard of value from the United States.

I have said that it was the admitted policy of the Government to recognize the issue of irredeemable paper money as an evil made necessary simply by the emergencies of a great war. It was a war measure. It was recognized as a war measure by the men who reluctantly voted for it. It has never been spoken of by them as anything else. Its permanence was always denied. The Supreme Court of the United States, on that unhappy day when they hastened to overrule, at the same term at which it had been delivered, the deliberate, well-considered judgment of the same court when differently composed as to members, still declared that it was a war measure; and if I understand the result of the decision that established the legality of the issue of paper money and making it a legal tender by the Government of the United States, if I understand the gist of that decision, if I understand its justification in the minds of that last majority who enforced it, it was because it was an act of necessity. It sprang from necessity. It was a question with them of the existence or non-existence of the Government; and it was upon no less ground than that, and upon no stronger ground than that, that they justified the emission of paper money and making it by law a legal tender. If I am right in that conclusion, then it follows that in time of peace, without this emergency, in the absence of such stress, the Congress of the United States would not be justified in issuing one dollar of paper money and making it a legal tender for the payment of debts.

If, then, there was no other reason; if it depended only upon the question of constitutional power to issue this money, I should say, believing, as I always have believed, that the power was at no time reposed in Congress, yet that the late decision of the Supreme Court, admitting it to be correct, did not extend, and would not by them be held, if to-day the question could be argued before them, to justify the emission of more paper by act of Congress in a time of profound peace, in the absence of all of those causes which were held to create the necessity for and justify the emission in 1862 and 1863.

But, Mr. President, over and above the constitutional question—one that should have weight with every member of a government existing under a charter which each man swears strictly to support—the gross impolicy, the necessary evil of this measure, this renewal of a decree of banishment of the standard of value from our midst, would form to me so insuperable an objection, that I could not in conscience vote for any measure which contained such a proposition. It is not necessary for me to read the declarations of eminent members of both Houses at the time of the passage of the act authorizing these legal-tender notes to show that they were intended to be but temporary, that the exercise of the power was very doubtful and much to be regretted, or to show that since the war the retraction of the step and the resumption of specie payments was considered essential. I could have no higher authority, in this Chamber at least, than the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] So late as March, 1869, at a time when I first came into this body, I remember that gentleman was one of the most pronounced advocates for an early resumption of specie payments, and that he with his usual force, insisted that the only value that he gave to the act of March, 1869, "to strengthen the public credit," was that it would restore the currency to par and bring us to specie payments. Even the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] I find upon the record in December, 1865, voting in the affirmative that he "cordially concurred in the views of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the necessity of a contraction of the currency with a view to as early a resumption of specie payments as the business interests of the country would permit," and that the House "hereby pledge co-operative action to this end as speedily as practicable." To understand fully the force of that language it will be necessary to see what was intended by the Secretary of the Treasury. His recommendation was contraction as rapidly as possible for the purpose of resumption, and this resolution took shape in the law of April, 1866, which directed the Secretary of the Treasury to retire and cancel $10,000,000 of Treasury notes within six months and $4,000,000 more in every month thereafter, with the avowed policy of continuing that retirement and cancellation until the whole body of the notes should have been retired.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Senator, I suppose, alluded to me when he referred to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BAYARD. I mean Mr. THOMAS W. FERRY, of Michigan, who I presume is the same gentleman who is now the Senator from Michigan. In 1865 he is recorded in the House of Representatives as having voted in the affirmative on the resolution which I have just read.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. If the Senator will allow me. He is correct; but I think that was in 1865 or 1866.

Mr. BAYARD. It was December 18, 1865.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I think that was on my entrance into the other branch of Congress. At that time, under the pressure of what was known as the McCulloch policy, and which was brought to bear upon Congress, urging, as it were, the necessity of contraction, and against my judgment, I did vote with other members of the House in the majority for a contraction of the currency, for the purpose of testing that policy. If the Senator will continue his searches further on to the time when the contraction was arrested, he will see also that, at the time the act to suspend contraction was before the House, the Senator from Michigan voted to arrest contraction. My vote will there be found in the affirmative, and against further contraction. Having my better judgment confirmed by experience, and gold advancing illustrating the folly of contraction, I readily and very cheerfully voted to suspend contraction. I say this in self-justification, because the Senator has referred to my vote, and it would appear as though I had been inconsistent without his attention being called to my later judgment and act.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the Senator is precisely illustrating the truth of what I said, that his sense of duty, when undisturbed by the pressure of excitement in regard to money around him, was very different from what it has since become. He did start out upon the right track. He started out upon the track which by the common consent of both Houses of Congress and of almost the entire country, when the question was to a greater extent than now an abstract question, entirely in favor of the policy which to-day he repudiates and which to-day he is endeavoring to destroy.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. It is simply another proof that I am profiting by practical experience.

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, Mr. President, and if the Senator's experience would go but a little further back; if he would take but some little warning from experience; if he would but let history speak to him with a warning voice; if he would but read the history of finance, and of the very kind of finance into which he now endeavors to lead this country, I think he would be glad to retrace his steps, and find that he can stand only safely upon the true principles which he avowed and voted for in 1865.

Sir, I find a declaration of the late Mr. Fessenden, containing in a few words what was the policy of this Government, not only of the party with which he acted but of the country in 1868. He had not changed. His experience had been confirmed by the progress of events. He did more to oppose the cessation of the policy of contraction on the hard, safe, but perhaps thorny road to specie payments, than any other. Mr. Fessenden, in speaking of the arrest of the principle of contraction, said:

> If they take this one step in the other direction, I want to know if they are to resume and to sustain the policy which was created during the last Congress—a gradual contraction, according to the means of the country, in order to reach specie payments at as early a day as possible.—Congressional Globe, Fortieth Congress, second session, part 1, page 411.

What he said then in regard to the financial condition of the country is just as true, and indeed is fortified by additional facts, at the present time. He speaks of the act of 1866 authorizing and directing the cancellation and retirement of the United States notes with the avowed intention of continuing that process until they were all retired. He says that Congress—

> Adopted its policy then, and in my judgment the only safe way is to adhere to it. Sir, I will make one other general remark before I sit down. I have already said a great deal more than I intended when I rose. I believe that all the trouble, all the difficulty, we have arises from something that is unavoidable. The country is in an anomalous condition in regard to the currency. This arose out of a matter that we could not avoid—the enormous expenditures of the war. We have got to a point where our currency is disordered; we want to get back to a safe position, and as soon as we can. But there are people in the country who are everlastingly scheming to get back by legislation, by this scheme and that scheme and another scheme to shorten the time, or else to abolish time and say we will not go back at all.—Ibid., page 409.

Mr. President, could there be a better description of affairs at the present moment? Are not gentlemen, members of both Houses, now by one scheme and another scheme endeavoring to abolish the time and say that they will not come back to specie payments at all?

Mr. Fessenden says further:

> Now my idea is that only time will accomplish it. We cannot do it without suffering; that must come. Such a position as we are in we cannot get out of without suffering to the country in its business affairs, and the more you legislate to postpone that suffering, the more you legislate with schemes of one kind and another to tide over this time and tide over that time and the other, the more difficult, in my judgment, will it be to meet the crisis at last. The only way, in my judgment, that you can possibly get along is to establish your principle that you will return to a safe condition, pass your law which looks to that return, adhere to it firmly, and let the country understand that the consequences must come; we will make them as light as possible, but the time must arrive, or else the credit of this country is to stand for years and years far below anything that any true lover of this country would desire. I do not wish to try to avoid it by saying to the country that we have no opinion on the subject in reality, for that is the amount of this bill.—Ibid., pages 409, 410.

Sir, I have chosen the language of Mr. Fessenden as expressive of the admitted sense of those who were best calculated to understand the necessities of the country. The record of no man throughout the trying period of the war stands higher than that of Mr. Fessenden, or conduces more to give him the confidence of his fellow-countrymen. If he even created, as all public men who do their duty must create, some personal animosities in his life-time, his death has closed them all. I well remember the impressive scene in this Chamber when almost every member, or certainly many members of the small band of the opposition and almost every member of those who acted with him, rose to pay with greater or less force their individual tributes to his character and to his capacity. I have, therefore, chosen his language, the man who had been the Senator, the well-trained legislator, the able lawyer, the skillful financier, the head of the Treasury Department, and who after his experience there came back into the Senate to resume his labors here. I say that his judgment should speak to this body; it should speak to the American people; it should speak to warn men from departing from the very path which his good sense, backed by the opinion almost unanimously of the country, showed to be the proper road in 1866 and 1868. The same thing went on to the day of his death; and all that he said then is not only true to-day, but we have facts superadded from our daily experience to show that never was there greater necessity for standing by the principles and keeping upon the pathway which he pointed out for the restoration of the credit of our Government and of our country.

Mr. President, these ideas of inflation, these heresies in finance, that you can with safety banish from your country that gold and silver which is the accepted standard of civilized values, are of very late growth. There is a Latin saying, Nemo repente fuit turpissimus, and it is just so. No man at once will come to conclusions which if declared originally would have startled the community. Intimations have been given in the course of this debate that we are to do without, and do without forever, the presence of a money of value in this country, and rely solely upon a money of credit. The uses of a money of value have been derided. The two have been declared to be equal, and, if any, the preponderance in favor of the credit money alone. The honorable Senator from Indiana, as I understood him the other day, declared that a redundancy in the volume of coin and of paper money in a country led to the same results. Why, Mr. President, is it credible that so intelligent a member of this body could make such a statement? A redundancy in coin is instantly relieved by coin flowing all over the world, as it will flow to the point where it is needed, and the relief comes to the country that has suffered from the redundancy. A redundancy in paper cannot so escape; it is depreciated and discredited; it is received nowhere but in the land that unfortunately is the place of its existence. There it is kept. Discarded abroad, discredited at home, there is no relief from it except the relief of suffering that comes from debt and from the overcoming of debt, which is by labor. And yet such doctrines as these are to-day announced to the American people as being sound views of finance! As I said before, they are in direct opposition to what the Senator from Indiana said four years ago. It is not that I am seeking at all, or care at all, for the matter of establishing inconsistency, for perhaps if that were proven it would prove nothing in regard to the general subject; nor would I care to allow so broad and serious a question as this to degenerate into a small inquiry as to whether gentlemen of the Senate had always held the same opinions upon the same subject. If their former opinions are cited by me, they are simply cited by me to show that in calmness, and when they were in a condition to judge, their views were different and nearer the truth than to-day I believe them to be.

Mr. President, there has been constantly held up to us the fact that there was a suspension of specie payment in Great Britain for a period of some twenty-five years; that in 1797 an act of Parliament was passed authorizing the suspension of the payment of specie by the bank, and that that continued until 1822. Sir, the history of that time has been much misapprehended. The act of Parliament which did authorize the suspension of specie payment left out that which is the sting of our acts of 1862 and 1863. The act of the British Parliament never made the paper of the Bank of England a legal tender for the payment of debts. No man was enabled by the deliberate act of that government to cheat his creditor by paying him in diminished values. The act of 1797 did not make the bank-notes a legal tender. It did not alter in any respect the existing state of the law either as to the weight or the fineness of the gold coin. It merely suspended other provisions of law having in themselves no reference to the circulation or money system, by which in default of payment the goods or person of a debtor were made liable for his debt. This liability it suspended in cases where a tender should be made to the creditor of the amount of his claim in notes of the Bank of England. The only object and result and intent of the act of Parliament authorizing the suspension of specie payment by the bank was to afford a temporary protection from arrest of the body of the debtor. Let me read a few remarks from the review in 1810 by Mr. Huskisson of the history of that act and its operations. He says:

> If it had been proposed at once to make bank-notes a legal tender, and in direct terms to enact that every man should thenceforward be obliged to receive them as equivalent to the gold coin of the realm, without reference to the quantity of gold bullion which might be procured by a bank-note of any given denomination, such a proposition would have excited universal alarm, and would have forcibly drawn the attention of the Legislature and the public to the real nature of our circulation, and to the possible consequences of such an innovation. But, certainly, nothing of the sort was in the contemplation of any man when the first suspension act was passed. That it was then considered and proposed as an expedient which would be but of short duration, the course of the proceeding in Parliament abundantly indicates.

Again:

> It is impossible to conceive that the attention and feelings of Parliament would not have been alive to all the individual injustice and ultimate public calamities incident to such a state of things, and that they would not have provided for the termination of the restriction before it should have wrought so much mischief, and laid the foundation of so much confusion in all the dealings and transactions of the community.

In my opinion, the very sting of our acts of 1862 and 1863 was that they made the paper notes of the United States irredeemable and made them at the same time legal tenders for the payment of all debts, without regard to their possible depreciation. That they did depreciate was a result of their increased volume. The axiom has been stated here that the volume of this paper is the test of its value, that depreciation must follow and does follow its increased volume, and with every depreciation so much the further are you necessarily from the return to specie payment and so much the greater volume is required. It is a downward course which nothing can arrest except the stern resolve that it shall not be continued, but shall be recalled as fast as circumstances will possibly admit. I do not say that it is by contraction alone that specie payments can be reached, but I mean to say that without contraction you never will reach specie payments; and, therefore, when gentlemen continue inflation or cease contraction, they are either given a half vote or a whole vote for the perpetual banishment of gold and silver or a money of value from use by the American people, and for the destruction of all their standards of value.

The paper that I have read from Mr. Huskisson was written by him in 1810, when a scheme was submitted to resume specie payment by the Bank of England. In all of that time the English guinea retained its value, and was the standard of value. No mortgage was paid off in a currency worth forty cents of its value; no man was permitted to be defrauded by being compelled to receive for his debt a less amount; but when the amount that any one had to pay was to be calculated, it was calculated according to the value of the gold coin of the realm.

In 1822, when resumption was about to come, in order to ease it off, there was a proposition made and supported in the British Parliament to degrade their standard of value. It was proposed that there should be an alteration and a diminution of the weight and fineness of the coins of the realm. That was contested, and fortunately for the honor and the welfare of that country successfully resisted, among others resisted by Mr. Huskisson, whose reasons for its resistance are set forth in many speeches delivered by him at that time. In speaking of depreciation and of the power by the Government to decrease or increase by artificial means the denominative value of the money, he asks whether one is more moral than the other:

A constantly progressive depreciation of money is, according to the doctrines of the honorable member—

He might have said, I think, "from Illinois" or "from Indiana," if he were here with us—

the great secret of public prosperity. This is no new theory. He only proposes to revive the scheme of the famous Mr. Law in a more mitigated shape. If once adopted by any country, it must end as his scheme ended. You may retard its progress to maturity, but you cannot perpetuate the delusion. You must either retrace your steps, or the bubble must burst at last. This was the fate of Law's scheme, as it must be of any project founded on the principle now recommended to the House. During the existence of that scheme, what country was apparently so prosperous as France, what financier so popular as Mr. Law? exultingly mentioned by a French political writer of that day in the following terms: "A minister far above all the past age has known, that the present can conceive, or that the future will believe." Mr. Law, it is true, outlived his popularity and his scheme. He brought distress and ruin upon thousands, and died himself in misery and want. The more wary theorists of the present day might prolong the duration of artificial excitement, but they could not prevent the final decay and overthrow of the system. There is no escape from this result in any country that has, through inadvertency or a temporary necessity, once lost sight of a fixed standard of value, except by its restoration.

Mr. Law's scheme was that credit could take the place of value, and that by pledging the lands of France he could obtain the credit of France; and so he set afloat his scheme, which for the time brought that unhealthful, baneful prosperity to himself and to the community that was rash enough to accept his counsel, but the end was what all such ends must be; the depreciation commenced, and once commenced, by a law of its own nature it continued to daily intensify. And such, Senators, must and will be the fate of the money issued by the United States of America. If you do inflate your currency, if you do still further abolish intrinsic value from your money, it will necessarily depreciate, and as it depreciates its volume must be increased, because its purchasing power will be diminished; and you will find that you are simply practicing over again the lesson that Law taught France, and that has been taught in every nation that has tried this same sad experiment. Law died in 1720, and is buried at Venice, where, in one of the churches of that city, a monument is still to be seen, the translation of which is: "Here lies a celebrated Scotchman, an unequaled calculator, who by the rules of algebra has placed France in a hospital."

Mr. President, it is not worth while to read and repeat and multiply the history of a depreciated paper money, of a money of credit alone divorced entirely from value. Nothing but the extreme anxiety that I feel to save my fellow-countrymen from these results—not simply from the pecuniary loss, but from the demoralization that I know will flow from the distress that this inflation of paper money will cause—induces me to occupy so much time. If, as I said, you abolish standards of weights and measures, you put a premium on roguery; you will have nothing but the word of a man who sells his wares and merchandise that they are of the weight or of the capacity which he ascribes to them; you will have no standard by which to test him, and for the infraction of which to punish him. It is even more so of the standard of value, which, as I have said, is the very foundation-stone of all other standards. And, sir, it is to the helpless classes of society that the presence of this standard of value is most essential. Sharp-witted, keen-witted men in business may perhaps be able to protect themselves in making their bargains at the moment, and by their superior shrewdness defeat the efforts of their fellows to outwit them; but who shall speak for the poor laborer? Who shall speak for the widow? Who shall speak for the helpless orphans who ask in vain that they shall receive the honest results of their dead father's labor? Who shall protect them? The name of the dollar is all that Congress will give. The reality of the dollar is precisely what Congress will never supply if this system of finance is to be continued.

When I hear gentlemen say that the contraction of the currency, with a view to a resumption of specie payments, with a view to a restoration of a standard of value between man and man in our community, is the work, and the scheme, and the object of the Shylock, of the capitalist, of the man of wealth, I can but smile. The very classes so enumerated are those to whom a period of fluctuation is more apt to be a time of profit than any other classes of the country. If any men can gain by fluctuation and unsettled values, it is those who are engaged in trading skillfully and with capital which will enable them to insure and protect themselves against those very perturbations which necessarily come to every community where the standard of value has been abolished.

Again, Mr. President, I should like to remind the Senate—it cannot be too often reminded—of the wise and calm words of those who have preceded us, who knew this country in its earlier days, who saw its sufferings from this very question of disordered finance, and who fought manfully against the recurrence of those evils which it had inflicted on former generations; and no man has spoken more wisely than Webster on this subject, and I think I may close these rather desultory remarks in opposition to this or any other scheme of inflation by reading what he said in 1837 in the city of New York:

He who tampers with the currency robs labor of its bread. He panders, indeed, to greedy capital, which is keen-sighted, and may shift for itself; but he beggars labor, which is honest, unsuspecting, and too busy with the present to calculate for the future. The prosperity of the working classes lives, moves, and has its being in established credit and a steady medium of payment. All sudden changes destroy it. Honest industry never comes in for any part of the spoils in that scramble which takes place when the currency of a country is disordered. Did wild schemes and projects ever benefit the industrious? Did irredeemable bank paper ever enrich the laborious? Did violent fluctuations ever do good to him who depends on his daily labor for his daily bread? Certainly never. All these things may gratify greediness for sudden gain, or the rashness of daring speculation; but they can bring nothing but injury and distress to the home of patient industry and honest labor. Who are they that profit by the present state of things? They are not the many but the few. They are speculators, brokers, dealers in money, and lenders of money at exorbitant interest. Small capitalists are crushed, and, their means being dispersed, as usual, in various parts of the country, and this miserable policy having destroyed exchanges, they have no longer either money or credit. And all classes of labor partake, and must partake, in the same calamity.

Sir, no words of mine could add force to this language. It is the nature of all truth that it is eternal: and this truth, so grandly spoken by Daniel Webster, is true at this day and hour; and, recognizing it, I would it could come to the ear and mind of every man who believes that the best hope of the American Republic is in the honor, the honesty, and the industry of the American people.

For this reason I shall feel myself unable to vote for any bill which shall tend in any way toward the expansion of the volume of irredeemable paper money of the United States. Each step in that direction now makes it more difficult to return. And when I hear gentlemen say that we cannot return to specie payments as long as certain things exist, such as the balance of trade against us, such as the need of the country for currency, all this, it seems to me, is equivalent to their saying that they will not attempt to cure a disease until the symptoms of that disease shall disappear. There is just as much logic in saying that we will not return to specie payments until our financial troubles shall have all grown smooth, as it would be to say we will not take necessary remedies for convalescence until the disease shall have passed away from us. The restoration of a standard of value to the American people, the restoration of a currency which contains intrinsic value, is the point to be reached; and whether the road be hard or easy, it must be traveled if we are to escape the evils not only of the present but the still darker ones that threaten us in the future. So convinced am I of the truth of this, so plain does it appear to me, that I cannot consent to give my vote—weak as it may be in determining the result, and yet important to me and to my conscience that it should be cast correctly—in favor of any measure which contains a step in opposition to that contraction of the volume of the paper issues of this country which must precede the resumption of specie payments.

Now, Mr. President, one word in regard to the forty-four millions, a portion of which is embraced in the $382,000,000 fixed by the first section of the bill. I said something in regard to that on the day before yesterday, and I did not think it necessary for me to say, as the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] stated of himself just now, that in what I said there was no question of personal assault upon an individual. Why, Mr. President, not only was there none, but there could have been none from my point of view. I am not here to make personal assaults. I should be ashamed of myself if I stood here under guise of considering a mighty question like this making assaults, especially upon a man or a set of men who are not here to answer. I was discussing broad public questions; I was holding officials to their line of duty; I was declaring whether in my opinion they had overstepped that line or not. The question of their intent it was impossible for me to discover. The question simply was with me a question of fact, whether or not the law had been violated, and whether willfully or ignorantly or corruptly I neither have knowledge nor means of knowledge; and therefore it is not necessary for me to proclaim the fact that the motives of the parties intrusted with these large governmental powers were never considered by me for one instant. When I shall make, which I trust I shall not soon make upon any man in the Senate or out of the Senate, a personal imputation, it will be in such terms that he shall not be able to be deceived; it shall be too plain and too direct for that. There was nothing in my personal relations but those of entire mutual respect in all that I have kept with members of the Administration to whom I have had reference with regard to their acts. But in respect of this breach of public duty, in respect of what I consider this dangerous assumption of power in the issue of this paper money of the United States without warrant of law, my opinions have undergone no change since the examination which I was able to give to the debate from which the Senator from New York quoted so copiously on the day before yesterday. If I considered that $28,000,000 of this $382,000,000 had been issued by law and was properly part of the legal volume of the currency, then perhaps my objection to the bill would in some degree be removed. But I say I cannot so consider it. I believe, in the light of all that I have read and all that I have heard, the volume of the legal-tender currency of the United States this day is $356,000,000, and not one cent more. The $44,000,000, in my opinion, has been strangely miscalled a reserve. It never was a reserve. There was a reserve of $50,000,000 authorized by the act of 1863, in addition to the $400,000,000 which at that time it was intended should be the maximum of the currency; but that was eo nomine a reserve of $50,000,000 for the purpose of paying the temporary obligations and indebtedness of the United States Government, and that $50,000,000 has, in process of liquidation of the temporary loans by the Treasury of the United States, been absorbed, so that there is no portion of that which alone ever did form eo nomine a reserve of $50,000,000 now in existence, and incorporated with the volume of our paper money.

The $44,000,000 which under the direction and authority of Congress were in the twenty-one months between April, 1866, and January, 1868, retired and canceled by the Treasury was no reserve. No one has a right to speak of it as a reserve. It was a body of dead paper. It was no more a reserve, according to the terms of the law, than were the bonds which in 1870 the Secretary was authorized to recall and replace by new issues. There has been a misnomer of this fund which has led to misapprehension, and which I think simply serves to obscure the truth of the transaction.

The history of the debate of 1868, which preceded the passage of the law suspending the power of the Secretary of the Treasury further to retire and cancel the Treasury notes of the United States, will betray this to be the truth. A large body of the most intelligent men in Congress were opposed to the suspension of the power of the Treasury further to contract the irredeemable paper issues of the United States; and when the measure came up in this Chamber one gentleman, eminent for his position and equally eminent for his acuteness and ability—I mean the absent Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS]—saw fit, for the purpose of preventing the suspension of this power of contraction, and for the purpose of continuing the power of contraction, to throw out the idea that there was a power to increase to the amount already contracted. It was an acute proposition; but it turned out to be a rather mischievous one, for in the course of this debate it will be found that as nobody had suspected that such a capacity for mischief lay in the law as it then stood, the suggestion was sufficient to cause a rise in the premium on gold in the market at New York of some 6 or 8 per cent., because those who traded in this commodity saw in it the elements for future speculation and a further fluctuation of values. But the object and the force of that debate was to declare, by refusing to adopt such amendment, that the Senate refused to entertain the question that there could be, within the meaning of the statutes then existing on the subject, any authority, under laws plainly passed for the reduction of a debt, to find a lawful power of increasing the debt. So spoke all.

Mr. CONKLING. While the Senator is turning to the book, if he will allow me, I beg to suggest to him that he is mistaken as to the rise of gold in New York coinciding in time with the debate he refers to in this Chamber. The bill upon which the debate occurred, and which became an act, was a House bill, and gold went up during the pendency of the bill and at the time of its passage in the other House, not afterward, according to my recollection; and the rise of gold was said by those who took that view of it to have occurred in consequence of the introduction and probable passage of a bill to arrest the contraction of paper money.

Mr. BAYARD. It is not probably necessary at this time to say whether the charge was justly made or not. As the Senator has stated, it was made in the course of the debate. It might have been by the familiar process of post hoc propter hoc, that because the speech had been made in Congress by Mr. EDMUNDS and the suggestion had been thrown out, if after that the rise took place, it was in consequence of the speech.

Mr. CONKLING. My point is that the rise had taken place before the bill came here at all to be considered.

Mr. BAYARD. The fact, however, was stated to the contrary of that; but it is a side issue, and probably not of much importance. I only happened to mention it as a mere incident of the course of the debate. It does not affect the question of law. The proclamation was made by members of the Committee on Finance, by the chairman, by the next elder member upon it, the present Attorney-General, by the Senator from Indiana with peculiar emphasis, and by others, that it was idle to talk of such a power being contained in the law; and I find that the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] in opposing the amendment—it was offered, I think, by the Senator from New York—to include the word "increase," in order that the word "reduction" should not stand alone, used the following language:

> I trust the Senate will not adopt this amendment, not that I think it would change the existing law, for I have no doubt upon that point, that the Secretary of the Treasury has no power to issue any more notes. I think the Senator from Maine will agree with me that under the law as it now stands the Secretary has not power to issue a five-dollar bill except from the reserve to meet the contingency contemplated by act of June 30, 1864.

That was the reserve of $50,000,000, and it was the only reserve that was ever contemplated by any act of Congress. It is, as I have said a gross misnomer to speak of the forty-four millions retired and canceled as a reserve. No act of Congress ever spoke of it so; it is a latter-day thought entirely to speak of it as a reserve. The reserve was the fifty millions spoken of by the act of June 30, 1864, and referred to at this time and in this way by the Senator from Ohio in debating with the Senator from Maine, (Mr. Fessenden.)

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN rose.

Mr. BAYARD. Allow me to read the rest of the sentence. The Senator from Ohio proceeded:

> Except from the reserve to meet the contingency contemplated by act of June 30, 1864, and also to supply the place of mutilated and defaced notes; and that is the opinion of the Secretary himself.

That was stated by Mr. SHERMAN to Mr. Fessenden, and I find that Mr. Fessenden assented from the silence which he maintained. In reading the share that Mr. Fessenden bore in the debate, I find that he inferentially takes the same view, because he places his opposition to the amendment upon grounds totally distinct from those which were urged by other persons. Now I will yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not know that it is entirely fair to judge of the public actions of officials by what may appear in debate I think they ought rather to be judged by the construction of the law itself, and certainly contemporaneous exposition. Now, here are three laws authorizing $450,000,000 of United States notes. Each one of these laws, in plain terms, says that the Secretary of the Treasury may reissue the notes. There is no law saying that he shall not; but, on the contrary, there is a law that says that he shall not diminish them. Now I understand that the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McCulloch, did treat this as a reserve, and that all the reduction in the currency from the 12th of April, 1866, to February, 1868, was retired and placed by him in a reserve, and was not destroyed or canceled at all. That was the way Mr. McCulloch kept his accounts, treating it as a reserve, and where he did cancel and destroy he reissued the same amount canceled and destroyed, placing the $44,000,000 from 1866 to 1868 in a reserve, showing that he understood that he was only to place that money in reserve, and that it was not to be canceled. In the absence of any affirmative legislation saying that the Secretary of the Treasury shall not reissue, when the three laws said he might, I hardly think it is the right mode of treating the Secretary to say he has violated the law.

I agree with my friend from Delaware in his view of this subject itself, and I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ.] but I think we had better put it upon grounds on which we can stand. I by no means think it so plain that it is an absurdity to suppose that the law is susceptible of the construction which has been given to it.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, if a question has ever yet been discovered in regard to which men's minds do not differ I am not aware of it; and I certainly should not expect, on an occasion like this, when I think the Secretary of the Treasury, the financial head of this Administration, so very sorely needs arguments to assist him, that they would be wanting. I am very sure he has got them in very ready and useful quarters; and it is proper and natural that they should be made; but I am compelled to say, with all due respect to those gentlemen, that they have not in my opinion at all vindicated his right or relieved him from the charge which originally I made against him, and which to-day I am disposed to repeat.

The history of this legislation is not complex or obscure. I have shown by the terms of the law that there was but one fund known as a reserve, and that was a special fund of $50,000,000 for a specific purpose; and that fund is no longer in existence. It has been used for the purpose of discharging the temporary loan which the law authorized it to be made applicable to, and to the payment of which alone it could have been made applicable, and for which it was, to use its own phrase, reserved. As I have said, that was the only reserve. Now, what authority is there under any of the laws passed by Congress, or rather under the law of 1866—for that is really the only one that bears on it—for the honorable Senator from New Jersey to say that notes retired and canceled were to form a reserve? It certainly was in opposition to the language used by the law, which directed notes to be retired and to be canceled, and that in pursuance of a declared policy, that policy being, to use the language of the Secretary of the Treasury, which was approved by Congress with but six dissenting votes in the House, to contract and reduce the public debt. That was the language, that it should be contracted until the whole of the Federal Treasury notes should be exhausted. Now, according to the construction sought in 1872 and 1873 to be given, the Secretary of the Treasury could have absolutely retired and canceled the whole of the legal-tender issues of the United States, with the exception of $1,000,000; and when he had reached that point, the right instantly to reissue the whole volume would have been given to him under the construction stated by the Senator from New Jersey. If you admit his right to reissue one single million, or one single dollar, of the notes so canceled and retired, you have admitted his right to reissue the whole amount if they had been so canceled and retired, and yet it would have defeated the very precise end proclaimed to be the object of the law. No, Mr. President; there is not in the language of any of these acts of Congress any authority to speak of the $44,000,000 canceled and retired as a reserve. I challenge any Senator to show that the $44,000,000 canceled and retired were ever by Congress termed a reserve to be issued at the will of the Treasury Department.

I find that in the exceedingly acute and able argument of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] in order to sustain his proposition and in order to defeat the measure arresting the contraction of the currency—for that was his object—he endeavored to show that in this there lurked a measure of inflation, and with his usual dexterity he meant to use that argument to prevent the friends of the measure from voting for it as it stood. I find just this defect in the dexterous presentation of the case by the Senator from Vermont, and the rather fine and attenuated point he made upon it, for so I must consider it, that he entirely omits the cause of the legislation, he entirely omits the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury had laid before Congress his scheme of policy, that he had presented what would be termed in English phrase his budget, and had announced to Congress the policy by which the finances of the country could be brought into better shape, and that after he had announced those principles the House of Representatives hastened to accept them, voted, with the vote of my friend from Michigan, to indorse the scheme and policy of the then Secretary, that contraction, that redemption, that cancellation and destruction were the methods to be used in the road that was to be followed, and in consequence of that Congress passed a law authorizing destruction and cancellation to a certain amount. That is all of the law of 1866 on this subject. There is nothing in the law of 1866 or of 1868 that speaks of these notes as a reserve, and they were not recalled until that time, so that the phrase employed in the laws of 1862, 1863, and 1864 cannot be held to contemplate a contingency or a condition of public notes that did not exist until four years afterward.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I find that on February 25, 1862, there was a law passed authorizing the issue of $150,000,000 United States notes and providing that those notes might be reissued from time to time as the exigencies of the public interests required. I find an act of July 11, 1862, for $150,000,000 more, and providing that they might be reissued from time to time. In 1863, $150,000,000 more were authorized, with a provision that they might be reissued. I find no law saying they shall not be reissued, but on the contrary I find a law in these words: "That of the United States notes, not more than $10,000,000 may be retired and canceled within six months from the passage of this act, and thereafter not more than $4,000,000 in any one month," which is not a provision against reissuing, which is not a provision against increase, but is a provision against diminution. And I find that the act of 1868 is not a provision against reissuing, but it is a provision against reduction. Therefore the affirmative legislation of those three acts stands, and it is only by an inference that an argument can be made that reissue is prohibited. That argument is this: that saying that the notes should not be reduced more than that, was equivalent to saying that they should be reduced to that amount. Now let us look at that.

What do the words "retired and canceled" mean? When you cancel a note, you do not destroy it by any manner of means. Every week there is a cord and a half of fractional currency canceled, and if that means destroyed, we should be without any fractional currency very soon. It means that you cancel that particular paper; but the affirmative provision of the law which says you may issue so many millions of fractional currency still exists and has power until you repeal that law.

What do you mean when you say that money shall be retired? Do you mean that it is to be destroyed? By no means. You may go to the Secretary of the Treasury, and you will find that when the law says he shall retire notes, it means that they go into a reserve; and that was Mr. McCulloch's interpretation of this act, and from 1866 to 1868 he carried out that law; and I have here the statement as it appears in the Department of the Treasury of notes "withdrawn and reserved," commencing with 1866 and running down to December, 1867, about $43,000,000. It is in the reserve. Then it appears in another column that he withdrew and destroyed $12,535,000; but it appears that the very next month he issued $12,500,000. So, as I understand, if this law had been affirmative it would only have meant that the notes should be retired and should go into the reserve. At all events, that was the construction that Mr. McCulloch gave to this act. But, in the absence of affirmative legislation saying that these notes shall not be reissued, it is hardly fair to the Secretary of the Treasury to say that he has violated the law.

Now, I am not in favor of this issue. I believe it was a mistake. I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ;] but I want to do so on fair grounds, without improperly accusing the Secretary of the Treasury of a misconstruction of this law.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

Mr. SCHURZ. If the Senator from Delaware will permit me——

Mr. BAYARD. I was about to remark to the Senator from New Jersey that his construction would be very unfortunate when he comes to extend it to the act of Congress of July 14, 1870, which directs the refunding of the national debt, and by which the bonds that are taken up by the reissuing of the new bonds are to be, to use the language of the act, "paid at par and canceled in 6 per cent. bonds of the United States, of the kind known as five-twenty bonds, which have become or shall hereafter become redeemable by the terms of their issue."

We find that when the Secretary reports to Congress the condition of the national debt, he does not report the $300,000,000 bonds which he paid and canceled by the issue of new bonds as a part of the public debt; and the Secretary of the Treasury did not report the forty-four millions of notes which had been paid and canceled as part of the public debt, because the country did not owe it; because it was no longer in legal existence; and it will be rather a surprise to the people and financiers of this country to learn that the three hundred millions which have been funded under the authority of the act of July 14, 1870, are, at the pleasure of the Secretary, to be issued again, under the construction of the Senator from New Jersey, for if he can issue the notes under one of these forms of words, he can certainly issue the bonds under the other.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. When the bonds are paid? I think there is a very clear distinction. If the bonds are paid and canceled, of course that is the last of them; but when we have a certain amount of currency which has been authorized, and we choose to put part of it into a reserve for a time, to be used as exigencies require, the case is very different from a paid bond.

Mr. BAYARD. How can he get the bonds but by paying them? And how does he get the currency but by paying for it? They were both the same thing; and both acts were performed by the Secretary of the Treasury under the direction of a law of Congress, with this additional fact in respect of the notes, that the notes were paid under the declared policy of Congress to diminish the volume of their circulation with a view to a certain end, to wit, the resumption of specie payments. The volume of the currency was diminished; to use the language of the act of February 4, 1868, "from and after the passage of this act the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to make any reduction in the currency by retiring and canceling United States notes, shall be, and hereby is, suspended."

What is the whole force, what is the necessary and absolute result, of such language? This was the language used by the act of Congress arresting the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to contract the volume of the United States currency by retiring and canceling the notes, and reducing the amount of the public debt to that extent. Then, when you come to see what they meant to do in respect of where a reissue was intended, there were apt and plain words to signify it, for immediately afterward it was declared:

But nothing herein contained shall prevent the cancellation and destruction of mutilated United States notes and the replacing the same with notes of the same character and amount.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to suggest to the Senator that if Congress was so careful to reserve the right to reissue notes in place of those destroyed and mutilated, and was so careful to put that in express words, is it to be inferred that there was still a power in the previous language to authorize the reissue of $44,000,000? I think not.

Mr. CONKLING. Easily to be inferred, I answer the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think not.

Mr. CONKLING. I think the argument is the other way.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator from Delaware started a case as a parallel, that of paid bonds, and he compared them with these United States notes. There is no analogy at all. When a bond is paid it is defunct; it is done; but not so when they receive these Treasury notes, because every act which created the Treasury notes expressly stamps upon them their reissuability and says they may be reissued by the Secretary of the Treasury when they are received.

Mr. BAYARD. And especially when Congress declares that he shall retire and cancel them, that means that they are not to be retired and canceled!

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Congress does not so declare. Congress says that he shall not retire and cancel more than a certain amount, instead of that he shall.

Mr. BAYARD. Congress declared that "of the United States notes not more than $10,000,000 may be retired and canceled within six months after the passage of this act, and thereafter not more than $4,000,000 in any one month." That is language of clear, easy, natural force and meaning; and when gentlemen seek to destroy it, it seems to me, with all due respect for them, that they do split hairs, and that they resort to what I must term sophistries. In a direction to reduce the volume of the currency, to cancel and retire notes, they seek to find in those words an inference from which to base the reissue of the notes; not the cancellation, but the destruction of the cancellation which has been made, the removal of the canceling marks; not to retire, but again to reissue; not to reduce, but actually to inflate. It seems to me so clear an abuse of words, that I must say I think it is a straw for drowning men to catch at.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend speaks of these words being so easy and so simple that I trust he will have no objection to answering me one question in regard to them.

Mr. BAYARD. I think they are very hard to get over.

Mr. CONKLING. As they are so easy to deal with it will cause the Senator no inconvenience to answer one question that I beg to ask him. Had the legislation stopped there, stopped previously to the act of 1868, so that we should have no difficulty with that, would the Senator hold that the Secretary had, or had not, the power to reissue the canceled currency?

Mr. BAYARD. The $44,000,000?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. My opinion is very clear that, under the light of everything that had been passed by Congress upon the subject, such a power could not be held to exist reasonably.

Mr. CONKLING. Then, if the Senator will pardon me a further moment, it is not the act of 1868 which he relies upon in disproving the power of the Secretary. Shall I be right if I so understand him?

Mr. BAYARD. It is not necessary for me to include the act of 1868; but at the same time it is not necessary to except it when we are considering the action of the Secretary in 1873. The act of 1868 did not give Mr. McCulloch his authority, of course, for that was under the act of 1866; but the question is how in 1873 is the Secretary of the Treasury to gauge his authority? Must he not consider all the laws on the same subject?

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will pardon me one moment, if in 1868, prior to that act, the Secretary had no such power, certainly the act of 1868 does not affect the question. Nobody pretends that that conferred the power.

Mr. BAYARD. No, I do not regard it as conferring power, but it does explain by the language used what the meaning of the words of the act of 1866 was.

Mr. CONKLING. That may be; but I still understand the Senator to affirm that without the act of 1868 he finds the power wanting.

Mr. BAYARD. I do.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I do not see how the act of 1868 has any possible relation to it, unless he thinks that it in some way persuasively confirms his construction of prior statutes.

Mr. BAYARD. Not persuasively, but I think it does it emphatically.

Mr. CONKLING. Nothing is more emphatic than persuasion, as we know from my honorable friend. I did not mean that persuasion was not emphatic. Now, without having intended to interrupt the Senator—I do not know whether he has concluded his remarks or not——

Mr. BAYARD. I have forgotten the conclusion of them by this time.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator wishes the floor I will not pursue this matter one moment. I think my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] wishes to make some remarks, and therefore, in any event, I will occupy but a single moment; but I wish to say a word. I have just been reading again, with some care, the report of the majority of the Committee on Finance, and the views of the minority accompanying that report; I have listened to the honorable Senator from Delaware, and have learned from him both the emphasis of persuasion and the persuasion of emphasis. I have been listening for the purpose of instruction; but I feel compelled to confess that I do not know at this moment upon what statute the Senator from Delaware relies in denying the power of the Secretary, nor do I understand the argument which deprives him of that power. I have carefully read the debate which has been referred to. At a future time, if I can conquer the impression that it is not useful for me at least to postpone action by attempting to contribute to the debate, I shall be strongly tempted to refer to that discussion; and should I ever set myself up as a prophet, I think I shall take the recorded debate at that time as the basis of my claim; for reading it in full since the discussion the other day, I find myself comprehending very much more fully than I supposed I did at the time, the length and breadth and future of this question; and I find that the Secretary has claimed nothing, and that no argument has been made in his behalf which, without reference to suggestions from other Senators, I did not fully suggest then. I find that I read section 3 of the act of 1863, only one-half, and not the most potent half, of which section has been cited to us by the majority of the Committee on Finance, and so loudly did it speak of the power of the Secretary to issue the $44,000,000, that the Senator from Michigan, now gone but then here, (Mr. Howard,) for whose legal attainments and judgment we all had great respect, cried out, I might almost say, from his seat, "Why, that act is repealed;" and when I said to him that it was not repealed, but that it still stood in full force, by acquiescence at least, he signified his surprise and his conviction, too, to find upon the statute-book a provision which, unless we repealed it, did confer this power.

I say I have traversed the debate, I have read what was said by the present Attorney-General, then a Senator sitting before me. I think I could prove from the declarations of that Senator that he held no such opinion as was attributed to him the other day, by a question put by the Senator from Vermont. It will take but a single moment, without trespassing upon the time of my friend from Pennsylvania, to refer to a remark made by the present Attorney-General. I read what was said by the then Senator from Oregon, which made so much impression upon some Senators:

Now, sir, this amendment which he has offered——

That was the amendment which I had the honor to submit, which was to make this provision in the act of 1868 read that the Secretary should neither diminish nor increase the volume of United States notes.

Now, sir, this amendment which he has offered is wholly unnecessary, and cannot, as it seems to me, with propriety be attached to this bill. Nobody will pretend for one moment that this bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue any additional quantity of Treasury notes—

Of course not; nobody did pretend that; that was not the argument—

but it simply prevents the Treasury from any further contraction of the currency, so that there is no use whatever of appending to this bill a declaration that it shall not mean something which it cannot possibly be made to mean by any sort of construction that may be put upon it.—Congressional Globe, Fortieth Congress, second session, part 1, page 436.

That is all very plain sailing. Nobody, lawyer or layman, borrowing the phrase of the Senator from Delaware, ever supposed that this act of 1868 was to confer upon the Secretary any such power. The argument was, that if we found the power in preceding acts, we should find the power remaining unless something was put in that act which would take it away. That was the argument; and it was not met at all by this suggestion of the present Attorney-General, nor by another suggestion that he made, to wit, that if we adopted the amendment and said the amount then outstanding should not be increased, it would be inconsistent with some future act that we might pass, and therefore he did not want to say that.

Mr. BAYARD. He said a good deal more than that.

Mr. CONKLING. I have not affirmed that he did not. I say "another suggestion which he made," and if the Senator thinks I am mistaken, I will read his words.

Mr. BAYARD. I only intended to remark that if the Senator meant to limit Mr. Williams's objection to the amendment to the ground he stated, there were additional grounds that he gave.

Mr. CONKLING. I have read what he said on that point. Then he proceeds to say that—

It is not claimed that there is any law in existence—

That is what the Senator refers to, probably—which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue additional Treasury notes.

I believe nobody did, employing his expression, claim that. I have not found in the debate such an argument. On the contrary, I find that the argument was that when, as the Senator from New Jersey says, three statutes were in existence which provided that he might reissue or replace notes that had been called in, he might do that, not that he might issue additional currency beyond that; that was not argued. These remarks proceed:

And is it proper at this time to provide by a declaration of Congress—as I understand this amendment to be—that no laws which may be hereafter enacted shall be construed to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue Treasury notes?

Now, Mr. President, if I may say it with respect to both Senators, that point was about as cogent as one that my honorable friend from Ohio made the other day, and I did not understand the fallacy of it then, and of course he did not, when he said the Senate did not adopt this amendment to the bill in 1868 because it did not want to amend the House bill and send it back to the House; and here I discover, looking at the debate, that he himself had amended the bill, so that it was necessary that it should go back to the House in any event; and yet we could not put in just one word in order to guard against these prior acts, if that was really our purpose. When I look upon this debate, when I find that the Senate was warned over and over again that the construction which has since prevailed would be contended for, that that would be the public understanding, the administrative understanding, the judicial understanding, and when it was appealed to by the insertion of one word to negative that construction, and refused to do it, I must say it is the most extraordinary instance of the absence of a cause, of the absence of a motive, of the absence of all explanation in respect of the action of the Senate, that has ever fallen under my notice, if indeed the Senator from Delaware is right now.

Moreover, as the Senator from New Jersey has said, and as a statement the like of which I have before me will show, this legislation occurred in the midst of continual and notorious construction by the Treasury Department exactly opposite that for which the Senator from Delaware now argues. The then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McCulloch, by acts which were no secret, by movements of the currency to and fro which were published from week to week and from month, was holding that he had just as much right to reissue legal-tenders as he had to receive them and put the canceling-iron upon them.

Mr. MORTON. And that was when he was notoriously in favor of contraction.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly; he was notoriously in favor of contraction, and the notoriety that he was in favor of contraction was the beginning and the end of the want of the bill arresting it; and yet that being his position upon these acts which the Senator from Delaware now admits are those upon which he relies, without the act of 1868, with the whole case before him then as the Senator from Delaware now finds it, he, nobody challenging or criticising, in the very presence of the two Houses of Congress, month after month for two years was maintaining that, under the power to reissue and replace, he could pay out every legal-tender which he received; and here it turns out that in a single day he reissued and emitted twelve and a half million of legal-tenders and nobody complained. With these acts left untouched—for the Senator from Delaware has not intimated, and he will not, that there can be found any provision of the act of 1868 which touched them upon the doctrine of implied repeals—with these three statutes left untouched which had been construed by their predecessor in the Treasury Department without challenge, and without complaint in any quarter, the present and the preceding Secretary of the Treasury have continued to do exactly what had been done before. And, Mr. President, although during the debate upon the bill in 1868 I qualified with some care my statement of the law, I am prepared now to strengthen that statement. So far from all these recent lights which have done so much to illuminate the minds of other Senators and to show them the absence of this power, reversing my view, a re-examination of the question strengthens the belief which I had then, that the statutes are open to it and permit it, and that nobody is to blame for applying it.

The honorable Senator from Delaware, dealing, as I understood him, with the unuttered motives of the Senator from Vermont, not now here, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] explained his purpose in his amendment, which was a sort of parliamentary gymnastics, as I understood him, some sort of game of skill or angling by which he was playing off an amendment with a view to defeating the whole scheme. Mr. President, I understand from a Senator who hears me that, in a recent conversation with the Senator from Vermont, he has learned from him again that his deliberate judgment was then, and is now, that the Secretary has this power. I refer, as I presume he will have no objection to my referring, to the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT,] who gave me that information. It will not do, therefore, to dispose of this debate upon the theory that the Senator from Vermont was a man playing a game of billiards and studying the angles upon the parliamentary table.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, we all know that the Senator from New York is a wonderful master of phrases and has a very large army of adjectives at his command, but I do not think that I used any one of the comments in respect to the absent Senator from Vermont which the Senator from New York has imputed to me. My language in regard to him was very different both in its form and in its intent. I spoke of his ability, I spoke of his acuteness, I spoke of his opposition to the bill of 1868 and the form that it took; but as to his motives, except that he was opposed to the measure, and avowedly opposed to any arrest of the process of contraction, I said nothing; nor did I have any knowledge. I was not in the Senate at the time, and what I gathered was gathered from the debate; that Mr. EDMUNDS was in favor of a continued contraction of the currency and was not in favor of arresting the power of the Secretary to continue that contraction.

Mr. CONKLING. Not aiming, Mr. President, to repeat the language of the Senator, it was my intention to refer fairly to what he said, which was, if I understood him, that the Senator from Vermont having great dexterity in parliamentary proceedings—"great acuteness," I think was his language—and being opposed to arresting contraction at all, made, as he expressed it, "a very thin and attenuated point" (now I do use his language) upon what the act might mean, and offered the amendment as a mode of opposing successfully the passage of the bill. That, I think, is literally what the Senator said, and I did not mean to impute anything more than that to him.

Now, Mr. President, I venture to read a few words from what I had the honor to say to the Senate on that occasion, and I do it chiefly because of a remark which fell from the Senator from Delaware, that the Secretary of the Treasury was not wanting in persons ready to make arguments for him and to excuse him, and so on, from which it might be inferred—I do not know what the intention of the remark was—that Senators are moved now in their views of this question, or moved in their expression of views, by some personal or party or other attachment to the Secretary of the Treasury and his immediate predecessor. In order to show that my ideas on this subject are not discolored by partiality to those officers, I venture to read so much as this of what I said on that occasion:

> Certainly the public can come to no conclusion except that a majority of the Senate is determined now not even to confess, not even to have wrung or extorted from them an admission, that their belief is that in the future there should be no further expansion. Thus it goes out as a measure uncertain on its face, unstable in its effect, the subject of controversy as to its meaning, here and everywhere else. It goes out accepted by a large class of people as a permanent policy of anti-contraction, and by still another large class of people as a measure unmistakably indicating an intention positively to expand and render still more redundant than it has ever been before the currency of the country.—Congressional Globe, second session Fortieth Congress, part 1, page 527.

Mr. SCOTT. What does that refer to?

Mr. CONKLING. That is in reference to the act of 1868, and in reference to the amendment for which I was contending, which was that if we meant to say that this currency should not be reissued we ought to so nominate it in the bond, and that the omission to do so in the presence of the already existing statutes would leave in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury the power to issue this $44,000,000. That was what I was endeavoring to argue. Again I said:

> Then it is an antidote going with the other parts of this bill; it is something which will neutralize that poison of suspicion and apprehension which we set afloat; it is something declaratory of the truth that by its action to-day, or in its conviction to-day, the Senate does not intend to favor fresh paper expansion.—Ibid, page 527.

I find that throughout, speaking of the Senator from Missouri then here, (Mr. Henderson,) speaking of the Senator from Vermont, speaking of several other Senators, of whom I was one, it was insisted that without this amendment the power would remain with the Secretary which the Secretary has since exercised; and although the bill had been amended so that it must return to the House, these amendments were voted down upon such arguments as that from which I have read a part, made by the then Senator from Oregon, that nobody would pretend that that bill would confer any such power. I say again, that now, in the presence of the argument of the Senator from Delaware, having traversed the debate, having read all these statutes, and notably the act of March 3, 1863, if I were called upon as a lawyer to convict the Secretary of a breach of law, or a malconstruction of law, I should not understand the argument by which I was to do it, following Senators who say that he has violated the law; nor should I know the statute upon which to lay my hand that would convict him of any such maladministration or misconstruction. On the contrary, I think the very most that can be said about it is that it was an open question, if not a balanced question, with no preponderance against the view which the Secretary has taken. And I say again that if there be a body of men on earth with whom it lies less than any other body to criticise that action, it is that parliamentary body which refused over and over again to speak the one little word necessary to fix this matter, when there was not even the argument of convenience against it, when it would not have retarded the bill for one moment, and when the only answer that was made to it was, "It is not necessary."

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply wish to say a word, because a paper has been produced here that has taken me by surprise. On an examination of it, upon its face it shows that it is not what the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] supposed it to be. He supposed it to show an account of the $44,000,000 reserve.

Mr. CONKLING. Not at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. "The so-called $44,000,000 reserve" was his language.

Mr. CONKLING. If my honorable friend will pardon me, he will see that the date of the paper forbids that idea. When that paper commences there was no $44,000,000 reserve, so called. I suppose that the paper which the Senator has in his hand, although it is my paper, is the same in its contents as that which the Senator from New Jersey had. Speaking for myself, I referred to it merely to show that before the act of 1868 occurred, before the debate took place, as part of the history of the country, was the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury, acting upon these three preceding acts, which the Senator from Delaware now says gave him no power, reissued continually at his own will and pleasure the legal-tenders which had been called in and canceled.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am not disputing that at all. But Mr. Richardson, before he was Secretary of the Treasury, wrote a book, in which he called the $44,000,000 "the $44,000,000 reserve." When my honorable friend from New Jersey spoke of it in that way I was a little surprised. The Senator from Delaware asked him where he found the name of the $44,000,000 reserve. I knew it was in the book, because he speaks in the book of the "reserve."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have not seen that part of the book myself. The use I made of the paper was this. The act of 1866 says:

> That of United States notes not more than $10,000,000 may be retired and canceled within six months from the passage of this act, and thereafter not more than $4,000,000 in any one month.

The Senator from Delaware made those words "retired and canceled" mean destruction. I say that that was not the construction that Mr. McCulloch placed upon those words, because from 1866 to December, 1867, he had not destroyed these United States notes, but had placed them in what he called his accounts, referring to that paper—"a reserve," as that paper shows.

Mr. SHERMAN. The account kept by Mr. McCulloch was not of the $44,000,000 reserve at all. That appears upon the face of the paper. The surprise I expressed at the time was when the Senator spoke of this $44,000,000 reserve.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Not at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps I was mistaken in that. I ought to say that when the present Secretary of the Treasury wrote his book he said:

> Between that amount and the $400,000,000 authorized by law, the issue of the reserve of $44,000,000 is left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

There, for the first time that I know of, he speaks of the reserve of $44,000,000 as being a thing that is to be kept as a reserve within the power of the Secretary of the Treasury. Now, sir, the reserve kept by Secretary McCulloch was a reserve simply showing the ebb and flow of the Treasury, because it commenced after the passage of the act referred to, after the passage of the act which authorized a contraction of the currency. It commenced with a maximum issue of $421,907,000. That $21,907,000 above the $400,000,000 was a part of the reserve expressly authorized by the act of 1864 for the redemption of temporary-loan certificates. The $400,000,000 was the maximum of ordinary notes for circulation. The $21,907,000 was part of the reserve. Therefore, this had no relation at all to the $44,000,000 reserve, and the amount of outstanding notes continued at over $400,000,000 for some time afterward. I suppose in keeping the accounts of the Treasury Department, in keeping the ebb and flow of the Treasury notes, they simply continued this account, and never treated it particularly as a reserve.

No doubt the Secretary of the Treasury, looking at these laws, thought he had a right to issue these notes. I never have doubted, I never have impugned, the honesty, the integrity, or the sagacity of the Secretary of the Treasury. I have simply said that so far as I was concerned, after a fair examination of the law, I did not believe he had the legal power to reissue these notes. No one has impugned his motives.

If I may be allowed to add a word more, without taking up much time, the discussion of this purely legal question, now that the notes are outstanding and everybody regards them as binding upon the United States, seems to me to be rather a discussion of law without any practical bearing upon the case, except as a question of power; for now good lawyers in the Senate who had not examined the question before, after an examination of the laws, think that the Secretary had the power to issue any portion of the $44,000,000. Other Senators, who have examined the subject, who were also not here in the Senate at the time, notably among them the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Pennyslvania, both good lawyers, who have examined the question carefully, say he had not the power. Whether he had or not, the $382,000,000 have got to be paid as part of the currency of the country, and therefore I do not look upon the discussion as now of any great importance.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not understand the Senator from Ohio, then, as controverting the conclusion which I draw from that paper, which is, that as a contemporaneous exposition of the act of April 12, 1866, which says that the Secretary of the Treasury shall not retire and cancel more than such an amount, the Secretary of the Treasury did not understand by that act that he was to destroy those United States notes, but by his account did retire them, placing them in what he called a reserve.

Mr. SHERMAN. I regard this simply as a mode of keeping the accounts.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is all it is.

Mr. SHERMAN. But there is no such thing as a $44,000,000 reserve or any other reserve.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is a mode of keeping the accounts which shows the construction that Mr. McCulloch put upon this act, that it was not to destroy those notes, but to retire them in what he calls a reserve.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; it does not show that.

Mr. PRATT. I wish to ask my friend from New Jersey a single question: Whether it is true, or is not true, that at the time the panic broke upon the country like a tornado, in September last, the present Secretary of the Treasury was in the city of New York, and that he was strongly pressed to draw upon this $44,000,000 reserve, and whether or not at that time he denied or doubted his power to do so?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have no knowledge on the subject on which to give information. I saw by the papers that the Secretary of the Treasury was there.

Mr. MORTON. He admitted his power, and was strongly urged by nearly everybody, so far as I know, to exercise it.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, it was my purpose at one time to make what might perhaps claim the dignity of a speech upon this financial question.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Senator whether it would not be more agreeable to him to continue this debate to-morrow morning? The time of adjournment has very nearly arrived. If my friend would rather have an unbroken period to make his remarks, I will move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator appeals to me, and I wish to say that my whole conduct in this finance debate has been governed so much by the desire to reach a speedy solution, and I have so often refrained from speaking for that reason, that I will submit entirely to the pleasure of the Senate. If it is the pleasure of the Senate to remain here and hear the few remarks I have to make, I prefer to go on.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I think myself he ought not to be required to go on at this late hour; and perhaps he may retain the floor and let the debate go further this afternoon, as others may desire to express their views briefly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Chair understands the Senator from Delaware to have withdrawn his motion.

Mr. SCOTT proceeded to address the Senate. Having spoken for half an hour,

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SCOTT. I will yield for the present; it seems to be the desire of the Senate to adjourn.

Mr. SCHURZ. I move an adjournment.

[Mr. SCOTT addressed the Senate. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. RAMSEY. Allow me to suggest to the Senator from Missouri to change that to a motion to go into executive session.

Mr. SCHURZ. Certainly. I withdraw my motion to adjourn and move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I give notice before we go into executive session that to-morrow I shall hope that the Senate will sit this matter out until we get at least two or three decisive votes; I do not propose to sit the whole bill out, but to have some decisive votes.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to make a suggestion, at least to the Senate? Now, we have been hearing speeches all day on one side. On the side which is in favor of increasing the currency there have been no speeches. I am very glad to hear these gentlemen, but I desire to suggest that we agree on an hour to-morrow to come to a vote. Say at half-past two o'clock, or three o'clock, or any other hour that may be named, we will commence to vote and have some definite action.

Mr. CONKLING. Or even the next day.

Mr. LOGAN. Some time. Let us agree on a time when we shall commence voting, so that Senators may have notice and all be here for that purpose. If we meet and have only one speech a day—and I am not complaining of that, as quite a number of Senators are unwell—they will go to their homes, and a vote might be taken before they could be sent for and get here. The Senator from Pennsylvania will occupy the time in the morning until he is through.

Mr. SCOTT. Not very long.

Mr. LOGAN. Whatever time he occupies, I am very glad to hear him as far as I am concerned; but this we might agree to: that if nobody else wishes to speak (and I can say for quite a number whom I have conversed with, representing the side that I agree with, that they do not desire to speak) we shall to-morrow at half-past two o'clock begin to vote. I propose that to the Senate if there is no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois proposes to have an arrangement, by unanimous consent, by which voting on the measures involved in the bill shall commence at half-past two o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection to that understanding?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am perfectly willing to agree to it, so far as it goes. But I trust the resolution now pending, offered by me the other day, as to a ten-minute discussion, may be agreed to nem. con.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to that either, as far as I am individually concerned, and would be glad to see it adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution referred to will be read.

Mr. CHANDLER. Would not the Senator from Ohio accept five minutes?

Mr. SHERMAN. Ten minutes is as short as we can all agree upon.

Mr. LOGAN, Very well; let it be ten minutes.

The resolution referred to by Mr. SHERMAN was read, as follows:

That after half-past two o'clock p. m. to-morrow the debate shall be confined to speeches not exceeding ten minutes by each Senator on any pending proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, Mr. President. I am very sorry to run counter in any way to the views of the Senator from Ohio, and I certainly do not desire to seem to be impracticable. In the course of this debate I have twice asked the attention of the Senate, and perhaps on neither occasion for longer than was due from me to the Senate; but I am on principle against this limitation of debate upon subjects like this.

If it were a money appropriation bill which involved no principle but a mere question of the payment of money, in regard to objects which we all know are properly scrutinized by committees and Departments before they come here, I should say nothing about it; but I do not think it right to drive gentlemen to what they will come to, an avoidance of this rule by making dilatory motions, such as a postponement or a great number of amendments for the purpose of obtaining proper time to express their views. I hope that this one spot may be left in the country where debate will have its limit in the sense of high discretion of the gentlemen composing the body. For that reason I do object, as I expect always to object, to a limitation of debate except the limitation which is imposed by the sense of responsibility of members of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware objects.

Mr. SHERMAN. I give notice that to-morrow morning, in the morning hour, I will move to take up that resolution for action. I believe it will expedite matters and give every Senator a full opportunity to express his opinion. There must be an end to all debate.

Mr. HOWE. Why not go on to-night for a little while?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think that would be right to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

NEW MEXICAN LAND CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, communicating reports of the surveyor-general of New Mexico on the private land claims under grants to Felipe Gutierres and Juan José Gallegos; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and thirty-eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 25, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. ALEXANDER MCLEAN, D. D., of New York.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SAMUEL F. B. MORSE.

Mr. WOOD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution and accompanying memorial; which were referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the members of this House —— copies of the memorial services which were held in the House of Representatives April 16, 1872, in commemoration and honor of the late Samuel F. B. Morse.

To the honorable House of Representatives of the United States:

The memorial of the undersigned respectfully represents that, at the time of the death of Samuel F. B. Morse, they were appointed by the Morse Memorial Association a committee to make arrangements for appropriate services in honor of the memory of that eminent man. In pursuance of their appointment they took measures which resulted in the memorial services which were held in the Hall of the House of Representatives April 16, 1872, and which were participated in by persons from every quarter of our country. Meetings were held simultaneously in almost all the principal cities and towns of the United States, and telegraphic messages were received from them, and from various cities in Europe and Asia, expressing the sympathy of the nation and of the world in the honors paid to the memory of Morse.

Of these interesting and important services no permanent record has been published. Nothing but the imperfect reports given in the newspapers of the day has been printed.

Your memorialists spent much time and effort and some money in the arrangements for the memorial services, and they have a complete record of all the proceedings prepared for publication. As the occasion was one of great historic interest, commemorative of a name to which our country will always point with just pride, and as Congress took a direct part in the ceremonies, which were presided over by the Speaker of the House and participated in by members of both Houses of Congress, your memorialists pray your honorable body to authorize an appropriate publication of the proceedings to be made in a form worthy of the nation, and of the great man in whose honor the services were held.

PRINTING UNITED STATES NOTES, ETC.

Mr. DAWES, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be instructed to inquire into the necessity and expediency of requiring by law that the United States notes and other securities of the United States be printed in parts and at different places in order to secure greater security and economy in their preparation and issue, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

DEVELOPMENT OF MINING RESOURCES.

Mr. NEGLEY. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour now begins at ten minutes past twelve o'clock, and the House resumes the consideration of the bill (S. No. 16) supplemental to the act entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872. The Committee on Mines and Mining reported the bill with an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the second section. When the bill was last under consideration amendments were offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NEGLEY.] The gentleman from Nevada [Mr. KENDALL] submitted an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. NEGLEY. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Nevada, [Mr. KENDALL.]

Mr. KENDALL. I desire in the outset of the consideration of this bill to-day to withdraw my amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana. I do this in order to disencumber and reduce to its purest and simplest relations the discussion of the measure. I do it in order that we may studiously and carefully guard the interests of the gentleman named in the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

It is the unanimous disposition and the earnest wish of the members of the Committee on Mines and Mining, and of every member and Delegate from the Pacific States and Territories, to guard studiously the interests of Mr. Sutro. Therefore I withdraw my amendment to the amendment, and wish that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana shall be adopted pure and simple, saving all the vested rights, whatever they may be, of that gentleman. While we wish to guard all his vested rights, we equally and unitedly oppose the amendment of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NEGLEY.] For the same and similar reasons we are united in our hostility to that amendment. For the reason that we indorse the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana as saving vested rights we oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The effect of his amendment is to strip and divest parties of their vested rights. The effect of his amendment is to legislate for a case now pending in the courts—to compel one of the parties litigant to consent, nay, more, to give a bond to allow verdict and judgment to be entered against him, and that he shall walk out of court. That is the reason that we oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and approve the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. NEGLEY. I now yield eight minutes to my colleague, [Mr. STORM.]

Mr. STORM. There has been some strange fatality following Mr. Sutro in his attempts to carry out this great enterprise, an enterprise which has received the indorsement of the best scientific men in this country, which has received the approval and support of the most upright, conscientious, and able men who ever sat in this House. From the very beginning of this enterprise, in 1866, some secret power has pursued him. It followed him in 1866 and 1867; it came here into this House in 1870, and attempted to secure the repeal of the act of 1866. I do not say what this tremendous power is that is able to come here year after year and renew this fight upon Mr. Sutro, but it is none the less true that there is such a power somewhere fighting this enterprise and endeavoring to destroy it. And although the opponents of Mr. Sutro have been defeated time and again in this House in an open and fair fight, they now come here in this indirect manner and concealed way and attempt to strike down the rights of the gentleman who is managing this great enterprise. They have followed him to Europe, they have gone all over the world pursuing him and prejudicing the money market against him so that the enterprise may fail. I say this is true. It has been proved by an investigating committee, and it cannot be denied.

I have papers to show that some twenty of these companies, acting in obedience to the commands of this power, have raised over $200,000, ostensibly for the purpose of bringing a suit against the Sutro Tunnel Company, but really for the very purpose of engineering this bill through Congress. As it is well known there is no suit pending, nor can there be one pending until the Sutro Tunnel Company prefers a claim; and that company can prefer no claim for royalty until the mining companies along the Comstock lode shall have been benefited by the construction of the tunnel.

That power again showed itself here the other day in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN;] and now the gentleman from Nevada comes in and abandons that part of his position and continues the fight upon the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. NEGLEY.] I say that one or the other of two things is true: either this is an honest or dishonest bill; either the bill from the Senate seeks to accomplish the purpose expressed upon its face, or it does not. What is the expressed purpose of the bill? It is that these men who have located their claims shall perfect their title by taking out patents and receipting for them. That is or is not the object of the bill. Does the bill accomplish that object? If the construction put upon the bill by the gentleman from Nevada be correct, then I say the bill does not accomplish the object of making these men perfect their titles. On the contrary, I contend that the amendment of my colleague does accomplish that purpose, and in the only way that it can be accomplished, by compelling these men, within six months or a year, to perfect their title by paying and receipting for their patents.

Mr. KENDALL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STORM. I have but eight minutes, and the gentleman has had a great deal of time. I will yield, however.

Mr. KENDALL. I had but three minutes this morning. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] how the bill as reported by the Committee on Mines and Mining, with the Holman amendment attached, (excuse personality for the sake of brevity and clearness,) will infringe in the least degree upon the rights of Mr. Sutro.

Mr. STORM. Well, sir, the gentlemen have themselves already said that under the act of May, 1872, it was impossible to compel a party to perfect his patent; that a man may make his application and let it hang there years and years without ever being perfected. I admit that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana would protect him as to existing rights. But the objection which I have to the bill without the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] is that by declaring null and void all proceedings heretofore had, the right of Mr. Sutro, under the act of 1866, would become a mere nullity. In proof of that, I send to the Clerk's desk to be read an opinion of one of the most distinguished lawyers of this country, which shows that this amendment is necessary to protect the rights of the Sutro Tunnel Company.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 18, 1874.

DEAR SIR: Agreeably to your request, I have examined the law granting certain rights, privileges, and franchises to the Sutro Tunnel Company, and looked into the history of the legislation upon the subject. I have also examined the pending Senate bill No. 16. It does not appear on the face of the bill that its object is to deprive you of your rights; but if passed, it might seem to authorize such proceedings in the land office as would diminish the securities by which you hold them. Under this bill, if it passes without amendment, a little ingenuity and a little dishonesty, compounded in proper portions, would probably enable the workers of the Comstock lode, or some of them, to get patents free from the condition now imposed upon them by the Sutro tunnel law.

An amendment declaring that this law shall not affect your rights or authorize the issue of a patent for any part of the Comstock lode in any other form than that directed by the Sutro tunnel law would be perfectly proper, and in a degree at least necessary to save you harmless. But suppose the parties decline for an indefinite time to take out patents? I think they could not defeat your right in that way, but they would leave you without the legal security which the law intended to give you, and expose you to some danger from their machinations. To make you quite safe, the law now pending should contain a proviso requiring them to make their applications within a certain limited period, under the penalty of forfeiting their claims. It is true that they have certain equitable rights without a patent, and of these they ought not to be deprived, except for some default of their own. But there is no injustice in compelling a man to perfect an inchoate title, and so define his legal rights that neither he nor his neighbor can hereafter encroach upon one another.

You must not forget the animus which has prompted their proceedings heretofore. It is manifest that they would, if they could, take your clearest rights away and strip you and your associates of all the privileges which Congress has granted. No doubt they sincerely believe it a good act to deprive you of your property altogether. It is perilous to deal incautiously with an adversary who thinks it right to do wrong.

Yours, truly,

J. S. BLACK.

A. SUTRO, Esq.

Mr. STORM. That is the opinion of a gentleman who is as competent to judge of questions of law relating to mining as any man in this country. It is his opinion that there ought to be some amendment which would compel these parties within a certain time to perfect their patents, by paying and receipting for them, so that their claims may be defined. I say that if the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. KENDALL] is sincerely and truly the friend of the miners of his State, he will support this amendment; because it will go further to protect the smaller miners located along the Comstock lode and doing business in its neighborhood, than anything else we can do; for it will compel these thirty or forty large mining companies, that control the richest tracts of mineral lands in the world, to locate and define their claims, thus protecting largely the smaller miners. Because, when these large mining companies find that they can get around the provisions of the Sutro tunnel act, the acceptance of which is implied by their applications for claims, they will then try again to repeal the act and thus avoid all the conditions thereof. Without my colleague's amendment these large mining companies will permit all their former proceedings to become void, just as the Senate bill permits; then they can relocate their claims, and in doing so will float them, so as to absorb all the small mining claims adjoining, and thus get control of all the valuable mineral lands along this lode. It is this devilish ingenuity, concealed beneath the words of this act, that should secure its defeat. Let this House by its action to-day forever silence the opponents of the Sutro tunnel, so that its projector will have some time left in which to carry on to completion the greatest work of modern times in connection with the subject of mining. For seven long years Mr. Sutro has been compelled to spend most of his time here in circumventing the intrigues and plots of the Bank of California.

I charge here now that if members from the Pacific slope had allowed Mr. Sutro and his friends to devote their time to this tunnel, it would be nearly done to-day. I warn my friends from California to beware of the fate that overtook the members from that State who championed "Goat Island" and the "Pacific mail subsidy" in the Forty-second Congress.

Mr. NEGLEY. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE.]

Mr. NEGLEY. My time is very limited, as I have made so many promises to yield,

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] with a great deal of surprise. He has presented here a letter emanating, I believe, from his legal adviser, wherein it is stated that the passage of the Senate bill now under consideration would have the effect to deprive Mr. Sutro of his rights. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a proposition. So far as the Mining Committee are concerned I believe they do not care whether this Senate bill becomes a law or not. Now, if gentlemen are sincere, let them vote down the bill with the amendment, and then there is no necessity for the Negley amendment.

Mr. STORM. We will vote it down.

Mr. PAGE. The effort to force this amendment upon this bill is only an attempt to deceive the members of this House who do not understand the amendment or the bill.

Why, sir, the Committee on Mines and Mining have now under consideration a similar bill—I mean the Ward bill—a bill precisely similar in its provisions, except that it is a general provision, while this amendment applies only to the Comstock lode. Why do you attempt to force this amendment without first permitting it to be considered by the Committee on Mines and Mining and obtaining a a report upon it? Why take the matter out of the hands of that committee, and propose to ingraft this proposition upon the bill?

Mr. STORM. Why did not the gentleman from California object to the amendment when my colleague offered it? He accepted the amendment himself.

Mr. PAGE. I accepted the amendment, and I stated why.

Mr. STORM. No; you did not.

Mr. PAGE. I said that if the gentleman from Nevada, [Mr. KENDALL,] who was perfectly familiar with this matter, had no objection to the amendment, I had none. I did not at that time understand the full scope of the amendment.

Mr. STORM. That is not so; and the record does not so show.

Mr. PAGE. It is so; and the record will bear me out.

Mr. STORM. The record does not so show, as I can prove.

Mr. PAGE. The record I will submit to, whatever it is. I make my statement boldly, and it is upon the record. I defy contradiction in this respect.

Mr. Speaker, I would be ashamed to stand before this House and advocate or permit an amendment of that kind to be ingrafted upon a bill without raising my voice against it. Why do you single out the miners on the Comstock lode? Answer me that question. In the name of humanity, what have they done that warrants this House in singling them out and saying that they alone, the ten thousand miners upon the Comstock lode, shall be required to obtain their patents within six months or forfeit the claims upon which they have expended hundreds of thousands of dollars? I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that this is a bold and unwarrantable attempt to deprive the miners of the Comstock lode of their rights already acquired.

Mr. NEGLEY. I do not wish to extend the gentleman's time.

The SPEAKER. His time has not expired.

Mr. PAGE. I now desire to read briefly the report of the commissioner who was sent out there by this House to make an examination, and report to Congress.

Mr. NEGLEY. I do not yield to the gentleman to read all that report.

Mr. PAGE. The commissioner says:

In considering the cost of operating the mines by the tunnel, it must be stated that, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved July 25, 1866, the tunnel company is authorized to collect from all the companies mining upon the Comstock lode a royalty of two dollars per ton for each and every ton of ore taken from the mines after the tunnel shall be connected with them, whether the tunnel be used by the mines or not; that a tariff of twenty-five cents per ton per mile (or such lesser sum as may be agreed upon) for the transportation through the tunnel may be established; also a charge of twenty-five cents each way for every man connected with the mines who is carried through the tunnel.

Mr. NEGLEY. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WARD.]

Mr. PAGE. I hope the gentleman does not desire to stifle debate. I yielded to him the other day, and I hope he will have magnanimity enough to hear this side of the question. Before taking my seat, I desire to send to the Clerk's desk a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. NEGLEY. Just one word. I desire the gentleman from California to understand that the other day the other side had all of the time except ten minutes given to me, while to-day I have yielded most of my time, and I have yielded to gentlemen on the other side. I do not wish the gentleman from California to lecture me on this floor in reference to the matter of magnanimity.

Mr. PAGE. I yielded all of my time, and only kept five minutes for myself.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. NEGLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WARD.]

Mr. PAGE. I ask that the letter be read.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield for that purpose?

Mr. NEGLEY. I do not.

Mr. PAGE. Of course he does not wish information on this subject.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied this unanimous delegation from the Pacific coast does not now want this bill. They never wanted it for the purpose which it purports to carry out. It is not introduced——

Mr. PAGE. For whom do you speak?

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. It is not introduced for the purpose of compelling anybody to take patents for mining claims. Read the last few lines of the bill; and I ask the candid attention of the House to that portion of the bill. I am here in the interest of nobody. I do not care for Sutro or the Comstock lode. But I speak now in the interest of those poor men, and poorer men than those, who are now working the great claims of the Comstock lode. The principle embodied in this amendment is one filled with justice.

Mr. CHAFFEE. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. No, sir.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I desire to ask a question.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I am advocating it as a just principle; and of that I will satisfy gentlemen, if they will take pains to read the law. I stated that the object of this bill is not to compel anybody to take patents, but in order to forfeit proceedings already commenced for patents; in order that they, the large companies on the Comstock lode, may forfeit them—proceedings already had for patents—and float their claims, and so squeeze out, oppress, and destroy the rights of poor men who are mining to-day on claims east of the Comstock lode, which the owners of the Comstock lode have always insisted belonged to them as part of the Comstock lode. That is the cat in this meal; that is what is the matter with this bill.

I will read this last clause of the bill, and I will show gentlemen—and they will know I am right when I assert it—that it is not for the purpose of compelling anybody to take out patents; they can take them out now under the law as it now stands; but it is for the purpose, and the last three lines of the bill show it, of allowing proceedings already commenced, where applications for patents have been made but not completed, as in the case of many on the Comstock lode, to expire and become null and void, in order that they may "float their claims," in the language of the mining camps, and still further oppress, drive off, and squeeze out the poor devils now mining on the spurs and veins east of the Comstock lode.

Now read the bill. On its face it is plausible. If this were a good-faith effort to make men take out their patents I would not stand here and resist it. I have introduced a bill for the purpose of compelling men to take out patents for mining lands, but for a wonder the gentleman from California denounced me for that, and taunted me the other day with the fact that I had been burned in effigy, or rather his Senator had been burned in effigy for me, supposing that he had introduced the bill which was introduced by me.

Mr. PAGE. And that is true.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. And I am willing to continue to suffer by having others vicariously burned in effigy for that bill. While he tells me that tauntingly to-day, he is in favor of this bill, not because it will make anybody take out patents, but because of the last section of the bill, which permits proceedings for patents to be vitiated, and become null and void.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I am going to read the bill.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I desire to ask the gentleman one question, whether he thinks this bill is in the interest of the poor miners?

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I will tell you about that when I come to it. This amendment to the bill under consideration is, I am satisfied, in favor of the poor men, and I could prove it by the Delegate from Colorado if I could put him on oath. And he knows that I know it, and he knew it a great while ago. In 1850 I went out there and became a miner myself, and at that time I learned something about miners.

Mr. PAGE. Where was that?

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I am digging into this mine just now, [laughter,] and I am going to stop these companies digging all over God's creation, and putting in their claims all the way down to Carson River. I do not care a fig for Sutro's tunnel. I do not ask any protection for it. I believe he is an energetic fellow, and he has got some rights under the legislation of Congress. But it is not in that interest that I am talking.

But I must go back and read that last provision of the bill. I may say that I come from a considerable way out West, and I shall not go back on that region lying away out toward the setting sun. It seems that the farther west people go the smarter they get; and they of the mineral regions have fooled the Government on mining legislation ever since mining legislation was attempted. There has never been a good, square thing done on behalf of the miners throughout the whole mining territory of the Northwest. Every particle of your legislation has been in the interest of monopolies. Look at California, that State which is so rich in all that nature can bestow. To-day it is under the rule of the worst monopolies on this broad continent of ours. And so it is in Nevada. The dominant interest there is the interest of these monopolies. The men who come here and represent that country are honorable. All of them no doubt are honorable gentlemen, whom I respect and like. But it is just as natural that they should represent the dominant interest there as that I should represent the interest of my people. I find no fault with them about that. But I find fault with you, gentlemen, every one of you, if you do not give attention to this subject of mines and mining, to investigate it and see that this great patrimony of the country, of the whole country, is not frittered away in the interest of monopolists, so that the time will come when the poor miner can find no spot on the broad continent, at the foot of the mountains or elsewhere, in which he can dig unless in dread of the infernal claw of some monopoly, ready to take all he can make, or that it will drive him out altogether.

Such has been the history of Nevada. Such is the history of California to-day in many of the richest mining districts. And not a bill must pass that has not been manipulated and shaped and conformed to meet the wishes of those gentlemen who have hitherto shaped the mining legislation for the Pacific coast. I tell you, gentlemen, my people have some rights in this public domain, and, for one, I insist on their being maintained.

Now, if the House will pardon me for getting away from it, I will come back and read this last clause of the bill. [Laughter.] Yes, sir; it would be better to let the matter stand as it was before there was any legislation than to agree to this bill.

Mr. PAGE. Will you vote to repeal all laws regulating mining claims?

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I would rather do that than vote for anything you have as yet offered me to vote for. But I will read this last clause. [Laughter.] I do not doubt these gentlemen know what they are about. I give them credit for great skill. And I undertake to say, not as a miner—I do not go much on that; I have not mined for twenty years, but I mined long enough to know what is the matter with miners—but as a lawyer, that this is one of the most skillfully drawn provisions ever inserted in a bill brought before any legislative body. It provides for the case where applications for patents have been made. Now, why does it say those that have been made, and why does it not provide for those that are occupied where claims for patents have not been made?

The gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE,] to secure the passage of this bill—not for improper purposes on his part, I will say—has made a speech in favor of my bill. Why this discrimination and hardship against those who have applied for patents, and not against those who have not? Let me read this provision of the bill. I will read it all; it is short:

That where applications for patents for mining claims have been filed in the proper district land office, and legal notice thereof given without the appearance of an adverse claimant, and in which cases no further proceedings have been had for the purpose of perfecting title, such applicants shall make final proof and payment on said claims within one year from the date of the passage of this act; and in cases of like applications for patents hereafter filed, the applicants shall, in the absence of an adverse claim during the notice, make said final proof and payment within one year from the date of filing such application.

Harmless and beautiful in every respect! I do not object to it at all; but it goes further, and says:

In default of which the proceedings for patent so had by such applicants shall be considered void and without effect.

Now, if you have ever seen a mineral lode and examined it, you know it is a fissure in the rock filled with mineral more or less valuable. A claim is made on the fissure. It runs along the line of the fissure two hundred and fifty feet or five hundred feet, or whatever it may be. Where there are these applications for patents there have been surveys, and claims have been staked out, as in the case of this Comstock lode; and this legislation is in the interest of the Comstock lode. It is owned by nobody but speculators operating chiefly in its stocks on the stock exchanges of the country, solely in their own interest, while at the same time vast wealth is yearly produced from the mines to the interest and advantage of the country.

Under the provisions of this bill, at the expiration of the year, these procedings having become void and forfeited, these great companies on the Comstock lode can change and float their claims so as to put themselves in a better position for the purpose of squeezing out the poor miners.

On that subject, and in order to show that I am not alone in my views of this matter, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read an extract from the San Francisco Chronicle, a paper claiming to have the largest circulation on the Pacific coast, which, although not exactly on my side of this question, has had fairness and candor enough to say something in reference to this legislation which is just and true, and which I commend to the attention of every gentleman present, as stating the true reasons for and the true results of this proceeding. I ask attention to what it says in commenting upon the bill I introduced, and which requires all parties to take patents.

It is alleged that if the mines upon the Comstock are compelled to take out patents, they will be obliged to bind themselves to pay royalty to the Sutro tunnel, and that the Comstock mines cannot obtain patents that will effectually protect their rights. The first objection would seem to be easily disposed of. The Sutro royalty is in the nature of a franchise granted by act of Congress, and should the Supreme Court of the United States decide that Congress had the right to grant such a franchise, the royalty must be paid, patent or no patent, for the land belongs to the United States and not to the mine-owners, who may be ousted at the pleasure of the Government. The other objection probably contains the real reason for the opposition. The Comstock mines cannot obtain patents which will fully protect their rights, and the question at once arises, "What are their rights?" It is well known that all the mines from Ophir to Overman were originally located about a quarter of a mile to the westward of the line upon which they are now working, while the east ground was taken up by other parties. Gradually the work was pushed to the eastward as the western ground ceased to be valuable, and claiming the Comstock lode, the old companies being wealthy, and combining among themselves, called every body of ore they reached Comstock, and if any of the unfortunate owners of an east ledge sought to contest for their rights, the "one-ledge theory" was put in force against them, and by the aid of purjured witnesses, corrupt judges, and purchased jurymen, they were driven out of court, and often reduced to poverty. This may seem strong language, but the experience of any one conversant with Nevada mining litigation will point to its truth. In some cases, however, the east ledge titles were purchased by the Comstock companies after their owners were sufficiently attenuated to part with them for a trifling consideration.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Has my time expired?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I have only a word or two further that I desire to say.

Mr. NEGLEY. I will yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I wish to say in conclusion only, so far as this amendment is concerned, that if the Congress of the United States proposes to legislate upon this subject of patents at all, unless it be by a general bill in the way I propose, it ought to require the patents to be taken out under the law as it now exists. That is all the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] provides. I do not care much about it one way or the other. I believe that so far as the rights of Mr. Sutro are concerned they are safe enough, though I do not much care whether they are or are not; but I insist that a change of the law ought not to be made in the interest of those who desire to float their claims in order to get more advantageous ground and so to squeeze out the poorer miners.

Mr. NEGLEY. I now yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LOWE] who is a member of the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. LOWE. Mr. Speaker, it has seemed to me a little singular that this bill which came from the Senate, and which has been considered by the Committee on Mines and Mining and reported to this House for the purpose of accomplishing two several, well-defined objects, should have elicited so much feeling, so much animosity, and so much controversy upon this floor.

If for one moment I supposed that the object or the effect of this bill was to impair so deleteriously the rights of anybody in the mining industries of the country, I should at once be in favor of placing a heavy foot upon its passage. But if I can get the attention of this House for two or three minutes, to show what I believe to be the object, purpose, and beneficial effect of this bill, I think it will do away with much of the prejudice which has been sought to be stimulated against it by those who are crying out against monopolists and pretending to be in the interest of the miners.

Sir, we have heard much of the monopoly of the mining interests of California and Nevada. We have heard it stated here that all the legislation which has been had upon this subject has been in the interest of the monopolists and against the interests of the humble miners of the country. I undertake to say, sir, that that is an allegation made in entire mistake of the legislation of the country, and of the laws upon the statute-book of the country. Sir, so far as these monopolies have existed in the mining districts of the country, they have existed and have their hold there now in spite of legislation, and before any legislation was had upon the subject. Go back to the legislation of 1872, which was the first methodical organization of mining laws in this country, and you will find that its very purpose, that its very object, and its very effect was in the interest of the humble miners of the country, and against these monopolists who are so declaimed against by the eloquent and learned gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WARD.]

Now, I have but a few moments, and I wish to say in those few moments just what the true purposes of this bill are. The bill is not designed to invade the rights of the gentlemen connected with the Sutro tunnel, nor the rights of anybody else, but it is simply to supplement a portion of the legislation of 1872, and make it consistent and harmonious in respect to the issuing of patents, which ought to have been provided for in that act. If I had time I would like to send the various acts passed by Congress to the Clerk's desk and have them read. But I have not time. By the sixth section of the act of 1872 it is provided that applications may be made by miners for their patents; that they are to make publication of those applications for sixty days, and after that the law provides in these words:

After their publication it shall be assumed that the applicant is entitled to a patent, and upon the payment to the proper officer of five dollars per acre that no adverse claim exists, and thereafter no objection from other parties to the issuance of the patent shall be heard except it shall be shown that they have not complied with the provisions of this act.

There is in that statute no provision as to the time within which payments shall be made and patents taken out. The effect of it is that miners make their applications for a patent and publish those applications and stop their proceedings there; get all the benefits of the act without paying for their mining claims and without taking their patents. This bill supplements that act by providing that they shall take out their patents within a given time, and that is the whole of it. Whether it applies to the Comstock lode or to the Sutro tunnel or to anything else, that is a just and wise provision. The other section of the bill is simply in reference to the mode of proof.

I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM.]

Mr. NEGLEY. How much time has the gentleman left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has three minutes remaining.

Mr. MERRIAM. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss the general bill, but simply to call the attention of the House to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY,] who, I believe, is not aware of the full scope and purpose of his amendment. Within it is contained a purpose to take away the vested constitutional rights of more than a thousand American citizens. I have no interest whatever in any man or mine in California or Nevada. But during the last Congress, having occasion to investigate this subject when there was a proposition to give Sutro a subsidy of $3,000,000, I looked into the history of these mines and ascertained what you all ought to know before you vote upon this amendment.

It seems that many years ago, when these mines were first discovered, the miners went there with their picks and shovels and went to work. After they had been at work some time, Sutro came along and said to them, "Here you are all on the top of the mountain. I will tunnel this mountain and take your ores down on the plains below, and will make a contract with you that I will complete the tunnel within a certain time, and you shall pay me two dollars per ton royalty for all the ores dug, whether they be taken out through the tunnel or not." The miners made this contract with Sutro, but instead of fulfilling his contract he came to Congress and commenced boring Congress instead of boring the mountain. The miners ascertained that the time named in the contract had passed, that the contract was forfeited, and they went on and built up a city that has to-day more than seven thousand inhabitants. They have completed expensive works for raising the ores and for ventilation; they have invested a large amount of capital, near and above the mines in Virginia City. Had Mr. Sutro fulfilled his part of the contract the miners would have fulfilled theirs, but instead, by a trick of his wits, he attempts to take away the vested rights of all these miners through the little amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NEGLEY,] which says in its last clause, "always subject, however, to the conditions of the Sutro tunnel act, approved July 25, 1866." The amendment attempts to restore an old forfeited contract, a contract forfeited by himself. I maintain that we have no right whatever, in justice or equity, to take away the vested rights of American citizens by legislation.

Mr. NEGLEY. I have but a few moments left, and I desire to occupy some of the time myself.

Mr. HOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield to me a few minutes?

Mr. NEGLEY. I have already yielded a great deal of my time.

Mr. HOUGHTON. As this question has excited so much debate, I hope the House will extend the time of the gentleman.

Mr. NEGLEY. If the House will do that, I will have no objection to yielding.

Mr. HOUGHTON. I ask the House to extend the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] for a few minutes, that he may yield to me.

The SPEAKER. No extension of the time by the House can interfere with the right of the Committee on Railways and Canals to the floor at half-past one o'clock, the transportation bill having been made a special order for that hour under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. NEGLEY. Then I decline to yield.

Mr. Speaker, after consultation with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and upon an examination of the provisions of the bill and pending amendments, I propose to modify my amendment, and in this considerate form I hope the House will readily assent to its provisions. I modify the amendment by striking out in line 7, before the word "months," the word "six," and inserting "twelve;" and striking out in line 13 the words "ninety days" and inserting "twelve months." In this shape the amendment will conform to restrictions in the first section of the bill reported by the Committee on Mines and Mining. I further modify my amendment by adding the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That unproductive mines located on the Comstock lode shall not be required to secure patents until the same shall become productive; but it shall be the duty of the owners or claimants of such mines to make a written report of the progress of development in their mines to the register of the nearest land office at the expiration of each year.

Mr. Speaker, the House has listened to the eloquence of the gentleman from Nevada, [Mr. KENDALL;] but he has not acquainted us with the phenomena of virtue and understanding which have induced him since the last Congress to change his attitude towards this great enterprise, when he so ably employed his energies and influence in its defense. When he was seeking to secure his election to Congress he indorsed the Sutro tunnel, as can be shown in the report before me, and which I include in my remarks:

SUTRO TUNNEL.

Mr. KENDALL, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, made the following report, (to accompany bill H. R. No. 2966:)

The Committee on Mines and Mining, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1173) entitled "A bill to aid in the construction of the Sutro tunnel from the proceeds of the sale of mineral lands," after careful consideration have prepared the accompanying substitute and recommend its passage.

Your committee have patiently and carefully investigated all the questions having any bearing upon the subject; they have heard the evidence of the commissioners and other experts; they have listened to the arguments for and against the bill; and without commenting at length upon the details of their investigations, they beg leave to submit the following statement of facts and conclusions:

1. Our mineral domain is almost unlimited in extent and of inestimable value.
2. The mines on the Comstock lode are the most valuable in the world.
3. They have yielded already $130,000,000 in bullion.
4. Their present annual yield exceeds $15,000,000.
5. Their future yield by means of a deep tunnel will be largely increased.
6. Deep tunnels are necessary for the full development of our mining interests.
7. The Sutro tunnel is of the highest importance to the future profitable working of the mines on the Comstock lode.
8. The construction of this tunnel was authorized by the Legislature of Nevada.
9. The mining companies on the Comstock lode contracted for its construction.
10. The Legislature of Nevada memorialized Congress to aid in its construction.
11. Congress, by special law, endowed it with certain rights and privileges.
12. Congress reaffirmed those rights by a refusal to interfere with them.
13. Congress again reaffirmed them by provisions in two general mining laws.
14. Congress sent out a commission to report upon the facts concerning it.
15. The commissioners made a report recommending the work to favorable consideration.
16. Some points in the report not being entirely clear, the commissioners were fully examined by your committee.
17. Other witnesses, among whom Professor Raymond, the United States commissioner on mining, were also examined.
18. The testimony (which accompanies this report, embracing eight hundred and ten pages) makes a conclusive case in favor of the tunnel.
19. The construction of the tunnel is entirely feasible.
20. It will cost from four to five million dollars.
21. It will take from two and one-half to three and one-half years to complete it.
22. It will be of immense benefit to the legitimate owners of the mines.
23. It will secure the health of the miners by good ventilations.
24. It will create an outlet for escape in case of fire.
25. It will establish a new basis of operations two thousand feet below the surface.
26. It will drain the water to that depth by its own flood and dispense with the numerous steam-engines now required for pumping.
27. The water contained in the mines may be utilized as a great water-power to pump the water by means thereof from below the tunnel level.

28. Greater depth may thus be reached than has ever been reached before in any mine in the world.
29. It will stimulate explorations on all portions of the Comstock lode, and may increase its yield to $50,000,000 per annum.
30. It will develop several lodes in the course of its construction.
31. Immense quantities of low-grade ores exist in the Comstock lode and other lodes cut by the tunnel.
32. These low-grade ores can only be utilized by means of concentrating works.
33. Extraordinary facilities exist at the mouth of the tunnel for the erection of improved concentrating and reduction works.
34. The tunnel itself will furnish sufficient water for concentrating and amalgamating purposes.
35. Cheap motive-power can be secured with coal from the Rocky Mountains and fire-wood floated down Carson River.
36. As a geological survey penetrating into this argentiferous mountain, it will be of the highest value to science.
37. It will serve as a pattern work for all the other mining districts.
38. Its success will give confidence in mining operations.
39. A practical illustration of the downward continuance of mineral lodes will give a high value to our mineral domain.
40. It will make capital flow in that direction.
41. It will result in the construction of other tunnels by private enterprise.
42. It will tend to populate our vast mining regions, and create millions of dollars of taxable property.
43. It will increase the demand for western produce and eastern manufactures.
44. The total yield of gold and silver will be largely increased.
45. The increase of the stock of precious metals has the tendency of increasing the money value of all property.
46. That increased value relieves the burdens of the people by reducing the rate of taxation.
47. It has a most important bearing on the payment of the national debt.
48. The Sutro tunnel is now in full progress of construction.
49. The company has secured funds to the amount of one and one-half million dollars, and is expending upon the work at the rate of $50,000 per month.
50. The work is of national importance, and the aid provided for in this bill will secure its early completion.
51. The security to the Government seems to be ample, unquestionable, and satisfactory, one-half of the royalty alone yielding at the present rate of production $365,000 per annum.
52. Under the bill reported the aid extended shall not exceed $2,000,000.
53. The company is required to spend an equal amount to that loaned by the Government.
54. One-half of all the net income will be paid over to the Government semi-annually.
55. The sum loaned, together with interest, will probably be repaid to the Government within a few years after its completion.
56. No money will be paid until the commissioners to be appointed shall report the completion of each section as prescribed by law.
57. A non-compliance with the provisions of this bill will forfeit all rights under the same.
58. The aid extended only applies to the first four miles of the tunnel, or until it reaches the Comstock lode.
59. The first section of the tunnel will form, as it were, the main artery or highway, from which many miles of branch tunnels may be constructed.
60. No further aid will be required, for, after the tunnel reaches the mines, the income will be sufficient to make it self-sustaining.
61. We would, in conclusion, indorse the language used in the closing paragraph of a report to Congress, made by a former committee, recommending a loan of $5,000,000, in the following words:

"That taking into consideration the magnitude of the undertaking, the great yield of bullion which will be directly secured thereby, the great influence by its successful completion upon all our mining interests, the stimulus it will give to mining generally, the positive proof it will furnish of our immense mineral wealth, and considering the importance of attaining these results in view of our large national debt, ordinary wisdom and foresight should command that the aid asked for the construction of this important work, or a much larger sum if it were necessary, should be granted, even were no security whatever offered for its repayment."

C. W. KENDALL.
JAMES S. NEGLEY.
WALTER L. SESSIONS.
WORTHINGTON C. SMITH.
P. M. B. YOUNG.
F. E. SHOBER.
N. P. BANKS.
HENRY WALDRON.

Mr. KENDALL. Will the gentleman allow me to say——

Mr. NEGLEY. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me. I shall do him no injustice. I shall only read or refer to his speech. In that speech, portions of which I include in my remarks, he refers to the resolution of thanks from his own State and the instruction of his Legislature.

Mr. KENDALL. Yes, sir; and I will take pleasure in showing the gentleman still stronger extracts on that subject.

Mr. NEGLEY. For the information of the gentleman I will quote from his speeches. He cites the following resolutions:

Resolved by the senate and assembly of the State of Nevada conjointly, That our Senators be instructed, and our Representative requested, to use their best endeavors to obtain from Congress such material aid as will secure the speedy construction of the deep-drainage and mining tunnel known as the Sutro tunnel.

Resolved, That the governor be requested to present a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolution, together with the reports of the committees, to each of our Senators and to our Representative in Congress.

Then the gentleman goes on to say:

These, sir, are the instructions under which I ask the aid of Congress in behalf of this important work. These are the solemn and deliberate acts of the Legislature of the State I represent. And claiming some acquaintance with the people of Nevada, and with their wants and desires, I declare here in my place that these memorials and resolutions faithfully represent the great body of that people, irrespective of party or politics.

Sir, I was pained to see in the minority report upon this bill by the honorable gentleman from California [Mr. SARGENT] this paragraph:

It [the Sutro tunnel] is simply a huge job, got up by speculators to tax the miners on the Comstock lode, without conferring any adequate or substantial benefits in return.

Sir, in behalf of the people of my State, thus repeatedly speaking through their Legislature, I repel the unworthy imputation, and assert that this enterprise is in the interest of the people—the working, tax paying people, of the State; and it is an enterprise, too, than which none more deserving was ever asking aid before the American Congress.

"But," says the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM,] "Sutro is an adventurer." Adventurer! Go, sir, to those western mountains and see what this "adventurer" has done. My friend from New York [Mr. MERRIAM] says he visited the locality of the Sutro tunnel "a year and a half ago," Had he been there with me last October, he would have been filled with wonder and astonishment at the magnitude of the operations then going on; the main tunnel driven in and completed over twelve hundred feet; four perpendicular shafts sinking along the tunnel line to connect with it depths varying from five hundred to fifteen hundred feet, so that soon nine working faces of the tunnel will be presented to the workmen for simultaneous attack, and most ponderous and substantial machinery and buildings erected over these shafts; nearly six hundred men employed; and a total expenditure for the previous year of nearly $1,000,000.

Sir, call Mr. Sutro an "adventurer," if you please, or an enthusiast. I would that we had more such adventurers and more such enthusiasts to develop the industries of the new and growing West. Granted that he is an enthusiast. What great work in war, or politics, or art, or science, or literature, in public or private life, is accomplished without enthusiasm or without enthusiasts? This adventurer, this enthusiast, is a gentleman of the highest learning, intelligence, and culture; a gentleman of integrity, and thoroughly versed in all the business details of this gigantic work, against whom, in all his intercourse with members of this and previous Congresses, for the last six or seven years, not one word of reproach has been breathed, and who during that intercourse has done more by his publications, which the learned and skillful miner, the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM,] affects to despise—by his intelligent discourse and conversation, by his arguments before committees of both House and Senate, and by his enthusiasm, to illustrate the great mining resources of the Pacific west, than has been done by all her representatives together in both branches of Congress, from the admission of Oregon and California as States of the Union down to the present time.

I know I shall be pardoned if I refer to myself in the course which this debate has taken through remarks of gentlemen who oppose this bill. In the last canvass in that State I advocated this, with other local measures, everywhere before the people. I advocated it openly and frankly as a candidate for re-election to the place I now hold. And with what result? I was the only candidate upon our State democratic ticket who was not defeated.

While the Grant electoral ticket swept the State by over two thousand majority, my own vote reversed that and gave me nearly one thousand over my competitor—a gentleman of distinguished ability, of the highest personal character and popularity, but who was either opposed to or non-committal in regard to this enterprise. And still further; it has been said that property-owners of Virginia City and Gold Hill, towns adjacent to this Sutro tunnel, will be ruined.

Now, people in this country are supposed to understand their own interests, and to be capable of guarding them at least against damage from their own voluntary acts. The people of both these towns are strongly republican in party politics. I advocated this measure in the popular assemblages. On the eve of the election, before an audience of near two thousand people at Virginia, I used this and similar language:

"Starting near the Carson River, four miles away, an adit level is penetrating the depths of the greatest and richest silver mine on the globe. Deep down under the place where you now sit, nearly suffocated with foul air, are hundreds of miners at work, who understand better than I can explain the advantages to our mining interests of this gigantic enterprise. I care not, I have not stopped to consider, whether this work is under the auspices of Sutro or Brown or Smith, or any one else. I have advocated the encouragement of this enterprise, too, in accordance with the instructions and request of your own Legislature."

Yet here I received a majority over my opponent. Now, sir, I surely will be understood as mentioning these matters not from any feeling of personal vanity, but only as answering the objection about the depreciation and ruin of the property to which reference has been made. This work is in the interest of labor and the laboring men of my State, and, indeed, of every mining State and Territory. I claim, too, that the constitutional authority for the passage of this bill is clear and unquestionable. It rests upon principles of interpretation which were settled soon after the Constitution went into operation, and which has been ever since steadily recognized by the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Government. I shall content myself with a mere statement of the constitutional grounds of the proposed legislation.

One effect of this measure will be to increase within our own country the production of gold and silver. Another effect will be to determine, develop, and increase the value of gold and silver mines, which are the public property of the United States.

* * * * * * *

One of the greatest drawbacks in these mining operations thus far is the irregular and unsystematic manner in which the mines have been worked. The question of the extent and continuity at great depth of these metal-bearing lodes has not been yet practically answered. Scientific men believe that these ore deposits extend down indefinitely. The experienced and practical miner, delving daily in the earth, has no doubt about the matter. But capital, always wary and timid, does not enter readily upon unproved ground.

What we now want is—

First. A demonstration that our metal-bearing lodes extend to the greatest depth; and Secondly. Reduction works, on the best and most approved plan, for reducing and economizing the low-grade ores, in which principally consists the wealth of all mines of the precious metals.

The difficulties, increasing from the first, of working the Comstock lode suggested several years since the construction of an adit level, which would facilitate mining operations by creating an outlet for the water at a depth of two thousand feet, and would also furnish a new starting-point and base of operations for still deeper work and explorations. This adit, known as the Sutro tunnel, has been run for a distance of more than half a mile; but three miles and a half still remain to be completed, besides a branch of three additional miles. This is an undertaking of such magnitude that private capital shrinks from it.

This tunnel, if completed, will beyond question produce two most remarkable and economical results. By means of it the mines along the Comstock lode can be worked at a depth of over four thousand feet, and the immense wealth therein contained brought to the aid of commerce and trade, and to the exchanges of the country and of the world. It would, besides, encourage a rational system of mining, and induce the investment of private capital in similar undertakings throughout all our mining region. Our mining operations would then lose to a great extent their present speculative character and become a regular business, based upon definite and certain results, as much so as the production of coal and iron in Pennsylvania.

The gentleman came to this Congress as the open and avowed advocate of this enterprise, urging not only protection to the vested rights involved, of which he has spoken with his usual force and eloquence, but asking Congress to give Mr. Sutro a subsidy of $2,000,000. Yet to day the gentleman appears here to oppose this simple proposition of protection.

Now, sir, any fair-minded person who will read the last two lines, 14 and 15, in the first section of the bill introduced by the Committee on Mines and Mining, will now see the hand of the juggler behind the curtain. It is to be remembered, too, that this bill was introduced in the Senate on the first day of the session by the long-avowed enemy of this enterprise, a Senator from California, whom the gentleman from Nevada opposed in his purposes, and who has consistently and constantly been in opposition to Mr. Sutro and his enterprise.

I confess that, like some other members of the Committee on Mines and Mining, I did not at first realize the scope of the provisions of this bill or the sagacity evinced in its letter and spirit. It was a delusion and a trick imposed upon the credulity of members of that committee. It is an attempt to accomplish the design which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARD] has referred to.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with the modification which I have made in my amendment, it conforms to the views of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, whose opinion on the subject I accept as a guide. I have here a circular from that officer pointing out the frauds that have been committed in regard to the location and surveys of mining claims. I quote the most important portions of this circular:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., November 20, 1873.

SIR: Information has reached this office that deputies, in surveying mining claims, are in the habit of following the direction of the parties in interest instead of adhering to the lines established in the original location of such claims, and thus in effect making a private instead of an official survey. * * *

A failure to make and record the location in accordance with the law and regulations in force at the date of the location will defeat the claim, and if it is not made with such definiteness as to operate as notice to all persons seeking to acquire rights to mining lands it will be void for uncertainty.

It follows, therefore, that in making surveys of mining claims it becomes essentially necessary to ascertain the boundaries thereof as established by the original location, for the rights of the claimant are limited and defined by such boundaries.

The practice of making surveys according to the dictation of parties in interest, instead of in accordance with the original location, has already caused great confusion and been productive of great injury to bona fide claimants.

You will therefore require the applicant for a survey to furnish a copy of the original record of location, properly certified to by the recorder having charge of the records of mining locations in the district where the claim is situate, and cause all official surveys of mining claims to be made in strict conformity to the lines established by the original location as recorded; and if the records of locations made prior to the passage of the mining act of May 10, 1872, is not sufficiently definite and certain to enable the deputy to make a correct survey therefrom, he should, after reasonable notice in writing, to be served personally or through the United States mail on the applicant for survey and adjoining claimants whose residence or post-office address he may know or can ascertain by the exercise of reasonable diligence, take the testimony of neighboring claimants and other persons who are familiar with the boundaries thereof as originally located and asserted by the locators of the claim, and after having ascertained by such testimony the boundaries as originally established he should make a survey in accordance therewith, and transmit full and correct returns of survey, accompanied by the copy of the record of location, the testimony, and a copy of the notice served on the claimant and adjoining proprietors, certifying thereon when, in what manner, and on whom service was made.

The act of Congress of May 10, 1872, expressly provides that "the location must be distinctly marked on the ground, so that its boundaries can be readily traced," and "that all records of mining claims hereafter made shall contain the name or names of the locators, the date of the location, and such a description of the claim or claims, located by reference to some natural object or permanent monument as will identify the claim.

These provisions of the law must be strictly complied with in each case to entitle the claimant to a survey and patent, and therefore should a claimant under a location made subsequent to the passage of the mining act of May 10, 1872, who has not complied with said requirements in regard to marking the location upon the ground and recording the same, apply for a survey, you will decline to make it.

The only relief for a party under such circumstances will be to make a new location in conformity to law and regulations, as no case will be approved and patented by this office unless these and all other provisions of law are substantially complied with.

If the law has been complied with in the matter of marking the location on the ground and recording the same, and any question arises in the execution of the survey as to the identity of monuments, marks, or boundaries, which cannot be determined by a reference to the record, the deputy should take testimony in the manner hereinbefore prescribed for surveys of claims located prior to May 10, 1872, and having thus ascertained the true and correct boundaries originally established, marked, and recorded, make the survey accordingly.

You will at once issue instructions to your deputies requiring them to abandon the practice of surveying mining claims under the direction of parties in interest, and conform to the rule as hereinbefore prescribed.

From an examination of the returns of surveys of mining claims I am satisfied that in many instances the deputy surveyors certify to the value of the improvements without ascertaining whether such improvements are made by the claimant or his grantors or not. * * * * *

You will acknowledge the receipt hereof, and issue the necessary instructions to your deputies to secure a strict compliance with the foregoing instructions.

Very respectfully,

WILLIS DRUMMOND,
Commissioner.

UNITED STATES SURVEYOR-GENERAL.

The gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] has appealed to the House in behalf of the great corporations on the Comstock lode. Sir, what are these corporations doing? They have authorized the expenditure, in California and elsewhere, of the sum of $200,000 to defeat the vested rights of Mr. Sutro. I hold in my hand statements and affidavits establishing this fact clearly to my mind, and I include them in my remarks:

SAN FRANCISCO, January 12, 1874.

Meeting of the board of trustees of the Ophir Gold and Silver Mining Company.
Present: Messrs. Grayson, Locan, Hall, Hassey, Lissack, and Peart.
The president presented the following report, namely:

"It is hereby agreed by the undersigned mining companies, owning mines upon the Comstock lode, in Storey County, State of Nevada, that they will, and hereby do, jointly employ R. S. Messick, of Virginia City, and C. J. Hillyer, of Washington, as their attorneys at law, to institute and carry to a final decision, under the direction of the committee hereinafter provided for, such legal proceedings as may be necessary to secure a final judgment denying the validity and estopping the enforcement of the claim wrongfully preferred by the Sutro Tunnel Company to a royalty of two dollars per ton upon the ore raised from the mines of said companies, or any claim upon the part of said tunnel company to charge said mines in any manner other than in accordance with the terms and stipulations of contract made, or to be made, between it and the mining companies respectively.

"J. C. Flood, R. T. Morrow, J. D. Fry, Benjamin Peart, and J. L. Requa are hereby appointed a committee to manage said litigation, and from the fund hereinafter provided for to defray the expenses of the same, including the fees of said attorneys, and of such other attorneys as, upon the approval of said Messick and Hillyer, the committee may deem it advisable to employ.

"The first meeting of said committee shall be held upon a call by a majority of its members, and it shall organize by the election from its members of a president and a treasurer, and by the appointment of a secretary. All subsequent meetings shall be held upon an order by the president or by a majority of the committee. The committee shall have power to fill vacancies occurring in its own membership, and a majority of the committee shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of all business."

For the purpose of defraying the expenses of said litigation the said committee are hereby empowered to levy by resolution assessments from time to time, as may by it be deemed necessary, upon each of the undersigned companies, provided that each assessment shall be levied upon all the companies at the same time, and provided, further, that the total amount of all the assessments levied shall not exceed for each of said companies, respectively, the amount herein set opposite the name of said companies, to wit:

JOSEPH MARKS,
Secretary.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
City and County of San Francisco, ss:

Before me, F. J. Thibault, a notary public of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, duly commissioned and sworn, personally appeared Joseph Aron, who, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he is a stockholder in the Ophir Gold and Silver Mining Company, a corporation having its place of business in the city of San Francisco, State of California; that he has examined the record-book of the said Ophir Gold and Silver Mining Company, and that the foregoing is a true copy of the minutes of a meeting of the board of trustees of said company, held at the office of said company, in the city of San Francisco, State of California, on the 12th day of January, 1874, as it appears in and is entered upon said record-book.

JOSEPH ARON.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 11th day of February, 1874.
[SEAL.]

F. J. THIBAULT,
Notary Public.

I also speak on the authority of a gentleman who told me he had seen the evidence in this matter. One of these companies has never applied for a patent, and yet it is a subscriber to this fund in the sum of $43,680.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. NEGLEY. I do not wish to be interrupted. There are but a few moments left me.

Mr. PAGE. You have made a statement that cannot be sustained.

The SPEAKER. The fact that one member makes a statement to which another member does not agree does not give the latter the right to interrupt.

Mr. NEGLEY. I do not criticise the impassioned argument of the gentleman from California. I give him the benefit of my silence in regard to his allusions to me as a member of the committee. I do not desire to disturb his equanimity by accusations against him or any other member. Such is not my habit; but I do state, and I demand a denial on such evidence as would command the respect of this House, that there is $200,000 subscribed and pledged to the purpose of defeating the vested rights of the Sutro tunnel enterprise.

Mr. FORT. I would like to know who has that money for distribution. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEGLEY. If the gentleman will read the circular laid on the desk of every member, the contents will tell him who has that money, how it was raised, who is to pay it out, how it is to be expended, and for what purpose.

I do not accuse any gentleman on this floor of a wrong motive; but I speak of the fact. I would not for a moment create a suspicion that the gentlemen I have referred to were parties to any such scheme; but they are under the shadow of it so far as it regulates the votes in their States, because one gentleman at least has referred to the fact that by espousing one cause he was elected to Congress when General Grant, on the opposite political ticket, swept the State by two thousand majority.

Mr. Speaker, I now ask the previous question on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and that which I have offered thereto.

Mr. PAGE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the previous question be sustained on the amendment will it give me the control of the bill for the next hour?

The SPEAKER. The vote would have to be taken on this amendment. The bill would still be open for amendment, and it would go over; and then some gentleman on the opposite side would of course be recognized.

Mr. ATKINS. Is it in order to move to lay the bill and amendments on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. ATKINS. Then I make that motion.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 73; no quorum voting.

Mr. ATKINS. I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first order tellers; and he appoints Mr. ATKINS and Mr. NEGLEY.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 36, noes 111.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. CHAFFEE. Is it in order to recommit the bill?

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will see at once by examining the bill——

Mr. NEGLEY. I cannot yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order to recommit the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is not; because the pending demand is for the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question recurred on Mr. NEGLEY'S amendment to Mr. HOLMAN'S amendment.

Mr. PAGE. I demand the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. POTTER. Let it be again reported.

The amendment to the amendment was again read.

The House divided on ordering the yeas and nays; and there were—ayes 9, noes 45; not one-fifth of those present voting in the affirmative.

Mr. PAGE. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. PAGE. I demand tellers on the amendment to the amendment.

Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. NEGLEY'S amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question next recurred on Mr. HOLMAN'S amendment as amended, and it was adopted.

Mr. NEGLEY. I now demand the previous question on the bill as amended.

Mr. PAGE. I believe I have the right to the floor.

Mr. NEGLEY. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment to the bill was adopted; and also move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, but of course this bill will go on until interrupted by the transportation bill. If the previous question be called it will then interfere with the special order at half-past one o'clock.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us go on with it, and get it out of the way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair only desires the House shall act intelligently, and therefore states the interference of one business with another.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It will not, unless the yeas and nays are called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California himself proposes to occupy an hour in debate, which under the rules he has a right to do.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman will not do that, but will allow this to go over to the morning hour to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. This business will continue until displaced by privileged business. The morning hour does not stop of itself, although sixty minutes have expired; and although the House may second the demand for the previous question on the bill as amended, yet the gentleman from California is entitled to an hour upon it to close; and that, together with the votes which will be taken, will consume the better part of the afternoon.

Mr. NEGLEY. I hope, so much time has already been taken up in the morning hour by the consideration of this question, that we will allow it to get out of the way as soon as possible. I demand the previous question on the bill as amended.

The SPEAKER. That cannot deprive the gentleman from California of his right to the closing hour.

Mr. NEGLEY. I do not wish to do that, but I have no desire to take up time unnecessarily.

The SPEAKER. The Chair only desires the House may act intelligently and know exactly how the various motions affect the pending business.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. What is the regular order?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour is progressing, but it does not stop unless by the coming up of privileged business. The transportation bill does not come up until half-past one. If the House shall second the demand for the previous question on this bill, it entitles the gentleman from California to an hour and will force a vote, which will consume the time of the House until half-past three. If the House shall refuse to second the demand for the previous question, then this matter will go over until to-morrow morning. The Chair makes the statement in order that the House may act intelligently on the subject.

Mr. GARFIELD. If there is half an hour which cannot be employed otherwise, I should like the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the legislative appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. There are only fifteen minutes left.

Mr. GARFIELD. It seems to me we had better use that fifteen minutes on the appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. It is for the House to determine. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands the previous question.

Mr. MAYNARD. Let me ask the gentleman from California whether he will not be content to go on now until half-past one and then yield to the transportation bill, and he will then have the opportunity to conclude his speech in the morning hour to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that can be done.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman from California will agree to that proposition.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that will be understood as agreed to.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will the Chair state what is the understanding?

The SPEAKER. That the previous question shall be regarded as seconded and the main question ordered on the bill and the remaining amendment; that the gentleman from California will occupy the time until half-past one o'clock, and that the bill shall then go over till to-morrow morning.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Perhaps the gentleman from California would prefer not to have his hour divided, and let the transportation bill come up at once.

Mr. PAGE. If that course should be more agreeable to the House, I will yield now for the transportation bill and let this bill go over till to-morrow morning, taking my hour then.

The SPEAKER. Then, if there be no objection, the transportation bill will come up now for consideration.

Mr. NEGLEY. The understanding is that the previous question has been seconded on the bill reported by the Committee on Mines and Mining?

The SPEAKER. The understanding is that the previous question is regarded as seconded and the main question ordered, and that the gentleman from California has an hour to close debate to-morrow morning.

Mr. MCCRARY. In view of this arrangement I propose to call the previous question on the transportation bill at a quarter before four o'clock instead of four o'clock, as previously announced.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to make an announcement to the House. The Committee on Revision of the Laws have been making every endeavor to be able to close their labors this evening; but there is a chapter in reference to the laws of the District that we have been preparing which we have not been able to get printed so as to present it to-night. The committee, therefore, will not ask the House to have a session this evening. I am not prepared just now to say whether we will have it ready to-morrow evening. If not, I will so announce to the House to-morrow; but this evening, as I have said, the committee will not ask a session of the House.

LIFE-SAVING STATIONS.

Mr. HOOPER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2655) to provide for the establishment of life-saving stations and houses of refuge upon the sea and lake coasts of the United States, and to promote the efficiency of the life-saving service; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Commerce, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

COLORED RESIDENTS OF CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW NATIONS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2656) for the relief of the colored residents of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PETER ROSE.

Mr. PARSONS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2657) for the relief of Peter Rose, collector of internal revenue of the eighteenth district of Ohio, at Cleveland, for tobacco-stamps stolen; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ELLEN O'HARA HARRELL.

Mr. RICE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2658) granting a pension to Ellen O'Hara Harrell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1385) to regulate the commerce by railroads among the several States. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, I have been so entirely content with the able and lawyer-like argument of the chairman of the committee, and the eloquent and original presentation of this question made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] and the very thorough, instructive, and practical statement made by the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] that I had no personal desire to take part in this discussion. But it so happens that I am the only member from New England upon the committee which has reported the bill.

This demand is for cheap transportation, a matter deeply interesting to the people of the Northwest, but essential to the life of the community to which I belong. We have no considerable water-power. Our State, it is sometimes said, produces chiefly granite and ice. We have to bring coal, which is the motive-power for all our industries, through other States from the sea-board. We have to bring from other States and from Canada the lumber and the brick which compose our dwellings. The food which feeds our workingmen comes from the West; while the iron, the wool, the leather, the cotton, are brought half-way across a continent, and by the skill of our workingmen are wrought into machinery, cloth, shoes, and other articles for the comfort of man, and then carried back again to be sold in their new form to the people who produce the material. There is not an hour of the day's life of a Massachusetts workingman in which he does not feel the pressure of the unjust demands of the railroad; there is not an article of his necessity or his luxury into the price of which they do not enter; there is not a product of his skill, there is not an ambition of his life, whether for wealth, for honor, or for usefulness, which is not affected by the railroad, and upon which it does not press as a burden, whenever it is permitted to make an unjust charge.

I do not wish to bring any partisan considerations into this debate; but I consider myself specially instructed by the vote of the last republican convention of my own State to give the best consideration and the most anxious care to the solution of this question. I ask the Clerk to read this resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the adoption of a policy which shall so reduce freights on railroads that the raw material, food, and coal of the West and South shall be exchanged at the least possible cost for the manufactures of New England, interesting to the whole country, is vital to the industries of Massachusetts; that the powers vested by the Constitution in Congress to regulate commerce between the States includes jurisdiction over this great subject, and that we call upon Congress and our State Legislatures so to exercise all their powers over the railroads of the country as, without injustice to them, may reduce freights and fares to proper rates, and secure the advantages of these great highways to the whole people, free from all preference or monopoly.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, this bill presents to us a twofold question, two questions which gentlemen who have opposed it seem to me to have constantly confounded. One is, ought the power asserted in this bill to be exercised by the Government at all? The second is, in the distribution of the great governmental forces between the nation and the States, which shall rightfully exercise this power?

In considering the first question, let us leave out for a moment any subtle constitutional distinctions between the national and State authorities; let us lay aside all questions of local self-government and of national power and authority, and let us consider whether it is wise, whether it is safe, whether it is not imperative, that the power which this bill seeks to exercise of restraining to a reasonable charge the price of transmission over the great railroads of the country of passengers and freight should be exercised by Government. Now, we agree that there are many things which we may constitutionally do which it is not wise or expedient or politic to attempt. We agree that in dealing with the question whether we shall pass a sumptuary law, it is entirely unimportant to inquire whether the Constitution in any case gives us authority to pass that law, because we are agreed that it is inexpedient and an invasion of the rights of the citizen to undertake to control his action in that particular. But, in determining whether that principle is applicable to this case, let me ask the attention of the House for a moment to the consideration exactly what it is that this bill undertakes to do. There is no attempt in this bill to fix the price between the consignor and the carrier. The bill provides two things: First, a mild, cautious, simple, experimental remedy for a known common-law right. That is the first thing that it does. The second is, that it enacts that an obligation which attaches to public carriers everywhere else in the civilized world, which attends upon the public carrier in every State so long as he is within the State authority, shall continue to rest upon him when he goes into the domain where the national authority is paramount and exclusive. That is all.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what was the English common law when the Constitution of the United States was adopted? The English common law provided that a person who took upon himself the office of a public carrier was thereby bound to all mankind to carry freight for a reasonable price. He could not charge what he deemed to be proper himself, but must carry the freight for a reasonable price and without unjust discrimination for all comers as they presented themselves.

Now, how was that rate enforced? It was enforced in two ways:

First, by the courts. If a carrier undertook to assert his lien on the goods he carried, and refused to deliver them to the owner, he would be a wrong-doer, it would be a conversion, unless it turned out that he was claiming only a reasonable sum, the burden of proof being on him to show that his charge was reasonable. And, second, if the owner of the goods was compelled to pay to the carrier an unreasonable sum, he could sue the carrier and get back the excess. That was the first remedy which the English law afforded.

The second remedy was this. I ask the Clerk to read the passage I have marked from a statute of 21 George II, chapter 28, section 3, which is a repetition of a prior statute of William and Mary. I ask the House to listen to the law which was in existence when our fathers framed the Constitution, and with which they were familiar, a law which prevailed in regard to the little carriers in England, who transported merchandise from the hamlet to the market town or to the metropolis.

And whereas by an act made and passed in the third year of the reign of King William and Queen Mary, entitled "An act for the better repairing and amending the highways, and for settling the rates of carriage of goods," it is enacted, that the justices of the peace of every county and other place within the realm of England, or dominion of Wales, should have power and authority, and they were thereby enjoined and required, at their next respective quarter session after Easter, yearly, to assess and rate the prices of all land carriage of goods whatsoever, to be brought into any place within their respective limits and jurisdictions, by any common wagoner or carrier, to be certified and published in such manner as is therein mentioned; and that no such common wagoner or carrier should take for the carriage of such goods or merchandise above the rates and prices so set, upon pain to forfeit for every such offense the sum of five pounds, to be levied and recovered as is by the said act directed; and whereas no rates for the carriage of goods from distant parts of the kingdom to the city of London, and places adjacent, have been yet settled, and several common wagoners and carriers have from thence taken occasion to enhance the price of carriage of goods to the prejudice and obstruction of trade:

Be it therefore further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That if any common wagoner or carrier shall, after the 10th day of June, 1748, demand and take any greater price for the bringing of goods to the city of London, or to any place within the bills of mortality, than is allowed and settled by the justices of the peace for the county or place from whence such goods are brought, for the carrying of goods from London to the said county or place, every such carrier or wagoner shall, for every such offense, forfeit and pay the sum of five pounds to the use of the party aggrieved, to be recovered and levied in the manner by the last-mentioned act directed, or by distress and sale of his goods, by warrant under the hands and seals of any two justices of the peace for the counties of Middlesex or Surrey, or the city of London, or city and liberty of Westminster.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. You will see, Mr. Speaker, the little English carrier, who carried merchandise from the hamlet to the metropolis from time immemorial, had his rates of charge fixed by the court of sessions. Every considerable town and city in this country to-day does the same thing for the hackmen—fixes an absolute limit of rate of charge for the carriage of passengers to protect the public from extortion.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right here?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Does the gentleman hold that the Congress of the United States has the same power to control the public highways in Massachusetts that the Parliament of England has to control the public highways of the British realm?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Of course I make no such claim. But the gentleman's question is not pertinent now. I am now dealing with the question whether this thing should be done at all, leaving the question of how far it should be done by the State and how far by the nation to a later stage. I am not at this moment inquiring whether it shall be done by Congress, but whether it shall be done by anybody. This bill does not even go so far as to undertake to do to the railroad what every city and town does to the hackman, and what the English law did to the wagoner. The bill simply provides that a commission shall be appointed which shall fix the limit above which, if the railroad desire to go, it shall not go unless a jury to which it may appeal shall say that the limit of the commissioners was wrong.

It merely changes the burden of proof, and it changes it in only one of the two cases which I have supposed. If the railroad undertakes to hold on to the goods and the owner replevins them, the burden of proof is now everywhere upon the railroad to show that it charged only a reasonable price. And if the owner of the goods sues the railroad to recover back an excess, in that case the burden of proof is on the owner to show that the sum demanded was excessive. This bill simply says that in such a suit the burden of proof shall be changed, and that the railroad shall in all cases, where it has exceeded the limit fixed by the commissioners, be bound to show that the sum it charged was reasonable. It puts the burden of proof upon the party that knows all the facts, upon the party familiar with the subject, upon the party upon whom it would be just and equitable the burden should rest in all such controversies. That is the whole of this terrible bill in which my friend from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] finds a danger to local self-government and the liberty of the people. That is the whole of the remedy which it undertakes to offer. Why, sir, it is milk and water compared with the complaint and the evil it undertakes to redress.

My friend from Vermont says all the citizens should be left free; that the question of how much the public carrier should charge should be left to be settled by a contract between the carrier and the owner of the goods; that it is a violation of public policy for the Government to interfere in a contract between citizens. Is the citizen left free now? Is not a contract of a public carrier with a citizen a contract in which the Government has already interfered?

Who is the public carrier with whom we have to deal? What are these railroads? In the first place, the Government has delegated to these railroads its power of eminent domain. They present themselves to the people with the sword of eminent domain in their hands, carving out for themselves great highways across the continent, over the land of the private citizen against his will, of which highways they enjoy a complete monopoly. The Government clothes them with vast corporate powers; it delegates to them powers of quasi legislation; it gives them the security and the vast strength of aggregation of wealth without personal liability under contracts.

Now, what are the powers which these railroads exercise? They are not powers which the private citizen can wield. They are not private powers, but powers expressly derived from Government. The power of the American railroad to-day is one of the strongest forces on this earth. The railroad crossing a State, crossing the continent, can put its finger upon this or that spot of the earth's surface, upon this or that populous town and city, and say to it, "You shall grow, or you shall dwindle; poverty, desolation, hardship, or wealth, manufactures, trade, shall grow upon this spot at our will." It can say to the active politician and the able lawyer, and the most influential citizen, "Come into our service, and you shall have power, wealth, fame, prosperity; resist our will, and you shall be stricken down and destroyed in all the ambitions of your life."

This is a power not like that of the State government or the national Government, laid down at the end of a stated period of one year or four years; it is a power not like that which governs State or nation, watched by a jealous and hostile opposition. But it is a power permanent as the undying corporation itself, permanent as wealth, permanent as the State, permanent as civilization itself.

I have mentioned rewards which the railroad has for its servants. But how is it with its masters, with the men whom it does not govern, but who govern it? For them it has in unmeasured degree the two supreme objects of human desire—wealth and power. One of the great railroad kings of the country has accumulated a fortune compared with which the revenues of empires are mean. It was said of another, by an eloquent orator the other day, that "he starts from San Francisco on his journey across the continent, and every sweep of his garment knocks down a Legislature." The tendency of things is, while the number of miles of railroads in the country and the amount of their business is rapidly increasing, to consolidate them and place them practically under the control of a few corporators.

The number of miles of railroad in the United States at the close of 1873 was 71,564. The amount of capital stock was $2,072,251,984; total debt, $1,999,741,597; total cost, $3,728,416,958. Gross traffic for 1873, $478,885,597; net receipts over operating expenses, $174,350,913. The last two items relate to 54,454 miles, all that are reported, on which the net income applicable to interest and dividends equals $3,201 per mile.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the notion entertained by my friend from Vermont of civil liberty and of interference with the right of the citizen is this: that these powers, these functions—so vast, so irresistible, so eternal—shall be delegated by the Government to irresponsible men who wield them; and that it is a violation of the right of the citizen when we come in and say that we will establish a board who shall declare what shall be the maximum charge they shall make on freight, and that the declaration of this board shall simply change the burden of proof in a law-suit.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I presume the gentleman does not intend to misrepresent me.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Certainly not.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I said expressly in my remarks yesterday that the State creating the corporation had entire control of it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The gentleman said that too; but he said also that for the Government to enter upon this province was an invasion of, and interference with, the right of the citizen. I shall come presently to the question how far a State and how far the nation can deal with this particular subject.

The gentleman from Vermont either agrees with me or disagrees with me. Does he say that it is fitting that whatever government has jurisdiction over the particular question shall somewhere or somehow regulate the charges of these railroads?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I confess—I do not know but I ought to say I am sorry to be obliged to confess—that I fear no Government regulation can cure the evil; and I think the gentleman will find the same opinion substantially expressed in the report of the Massachusetts commissioners.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Then, Mr. Speaker, the sturdy descendant of the heroes of the Green Mountains is not willing to undertake the duty of protecting the American citizens against the encroachment of these railroads because he is afraid he cannot do it. That is the other alternative. Now, when the convention of railroad managers meets in Buffalo, as soon as the canals freeze, and fixes the charges for freight, where do they get the power which enables them to affect the value of every bushel of wheat throughout the entire Northwest? Do they not get it from the Government? Are they not themselves the creatures of law?

If a dozen truckmen meet and agree that for carrying half a mile the trunks of passengers coming by rail to a station they will make a small increase of a shilling in the price, they are held amenable to the law. But the convention of railroad presidents may meet at Buffalo, when the canals freeze, and lay their tax on the products of the Northwest and the industries of New England, subtracting 10, 20, or 50 per cent. from the value of each man's day's work; and it is considered impolitic for the Government, which represents the people of the United States, to undertake to control the creatures it has itself made! Commerce between New York and San Francisco, the products of great regions of the earth's surface, the motive-power, the raw material of great manufacturing States, the food and clothing of millions of Americans, may be enhanced in price by a like combination; and the people which loaned them its sovereignty shall, according to the theories of government of some gentlemen who have addressed the House, be forever powerless to restrain them!

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. BUCKNER. Does not the gentleman know that in England the effort has been made for forty years, with all the powers of Parliament, to regulate the railroads, and that it has been abandoned as hopeless?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The working people of England are not yet adequately represented in Parliament. The people of America are represented in Congress.

Mr. KASSON. Parliament does exercise this authority of regulating railroads.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Yes, sir. Under the law of Parliament every English workman is entitled to find one train by which he can go out of Manchester, or Liverpool, or London, to his little home in the suburbs at a price not exceeding a penny a mile. That is one regulation which Parliament has made. There is scarcely a detail of the contract between the freighter and the railroad, the public carrier, which is not regulated in England by Parliament. I not only do not know the fact which the gentleman's question supposes to exist, but I believe the entire reverse to be the case.

Mr. BUCKNER. My idea on the subject is obtained from a report now before me, made by the board of railroad commissioners of Massachusetts, in which they state that all the efforts in this direction have entirely failed to accomplish anything in England.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Now, Mr. Speaker, I address myself to the second question. Assuming that it is a duty of Government, and that it is politic for Government to undertake it to the limited extent which this bill proposes, I now ask the House to consider whether, in the distribution of power between the nation and the State, what this bill proposes is the duty and the function of Congress.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I understood the gentleman just now to claim the same powers for this Government that the Parliament of Great Britain exercises with reference to the English people.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I made no such claim.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Does the gentleman claim that under our Constitution the Federal Government can exercise the same powers as the Parliament of Great Britain exercises?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. No, sir.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I understood the gentleman to argue that because the British Parliament regulates the prices which passengers on railroads shall pay and other matters of detail, therefore in this country the Federal Congress can do the same thing.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I make no such claim.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I understood that to be the gentleman's position.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The gentleman did not do me the honor to listen to what I said. What I said was that I was dealing with the question whether, to the extent which this bill proposes, government in some of its functions or modes of exercising power should go. I was saying that the railroads were themselves wielding the powers of government in dealing with citizens, and that therefore the government which had lent the railroads its sovereignty had a right to use its power to restrain them in dealing with the citizen. I was considering the question whether it was fitting that any government should exercise a power of this kind. Then the gentleman on the other side asked me whether I was not aware the Parliament of England had tried to do it but failed. I said no; that they had very largely, and in many instances, succeeded.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to the extent of the jurisdiction over this question which the Constitution confers upon Congress the States are powerless. Congress has the exclusive power to regulate commerce among the States, and, therefore, so far as this is a regulation of commerce among the States, so far the thing must be left undone or must be done here. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] has confounded, it seems to me, two things. I concede that a State which creates a corporation has the right to prohibit that corporation from engaging in commerce among the States at all. I concede the State which creates a corporation has the right, if it reserves that right in the original grant or charter, to prescribe the terms and conditions upon which the corporation may engage in commerce among these States. But that does not grow out of any power of the State over the subject-matter, but grows out of the power of the State over the corporation. But the State must necessarily, even exercising the power in that way, exercise it subject to the terms of the charter in a necessarily imperfect and incomplete manner if it is disposed to exercise it at all, which few of the States are. If a State is indifferent to the exactions made by one of its corporations upon the commerce of other States in transit, the citizen is without remedy unless the national authority interfere.

Let me state this point again. The charter of a corporation has been held to be a contract. When a State creates a corporation it may doubtless reserve in the charter the power to control it. If it has made no such reservation, it may still exercise over it such legislative control as it could over individuals in like cases. I concede, further, that a State cannot by contract, either with a corporation or an individual, alienate its legislative powers. But unless it has in some way reserved the right to do so, it cannot impose upon a corporation any duties, obligations, or restraints which are not within its general legislative authority over individuals. The State cannot prescribe the rule to individuals engaged in commerce among the States, because the regulation of that subject is the constitutional function of Congress. When, therefore, it issues a mandate on that subject to a corporation, unless it has reserved the power so to do in the charter, the corporation is not bound to obey. The State cannot rightfully say to the corporation, "We cannot alienate our legislative authority." It never had legislative authority over that subject.

This argument is all in a nutshell. The regulation of commerce is the regulation of the exchange of commodities. The exchange of commodities is commerce. The regulation of commerce with foreign nations is the regulation of the exchange of commodities with foreign nations. The regulation of commerce among the several States is the regulation of the exchange of commodities among the several States. An essential part of such an exchange is the conveyance of the commodity from the seller to the buyer. Regulation is the prescribing of a rule or law, or fixing the condition. To regulate the exchange of commodities is to prescribe the rule, or law, or condition under which such an exchange shall take place. An essential part of the regulation of commerce, therefore, is the prescribing rules, or laws, or conditions of the conveyance of commodities from the seller to the buyer. The fixing or regulating of tolls, or charges, or imposts for conveying commodities from the seller to the buyer is the prescribing a condition of that conveyance. It is therefore a regulation of commerce.

Now, whenever the fixing or regulating of such imposts and tolls properly comes within the domain of the law-making power, or whenever such imposts or tolls should be regulated by law, the power which regulates commerce should properly regulate them. This is the settled and unquestioned understanding with reference to foreign commerce. The Legislature does not ordinarily regulate rates of freights charged by public carriers for merchandise brought from abroad; not because such regulation would not be a regulation of commerce, but because such carriers are engaged in a business open to unrestricted competition, and it is deemed inexpedient to regulate commerce in that respect. But it exercises the power to regulate foreign commerce for the protection of the interests of the public in many respects where competition does not afford such protection.

Now, we have here a case where the public carrier engaged in commerce among the States is not restrained to a very considerable extent by competition—where, as I have said, we lend him the forces and powers of sovereignty for the exercise of his great public functions, and therefore it becomes the duty of a tribunal or Legislature authorized to fix the rule of law governing persons engaged in commerce among the States to fix the rule of law for him.

I confess, Mr. Speaker, I am astonished at the arguments which convince some of our able and intelligent friends on the other side when they wish to deny to the American people the power of protecting themselves against the oppression of the instruments they have themselves created. The most extravagant advocate of unlimited legislative power never resorted to such strained and artificial reasoning as do these gentlemen in their attempts to explain away the simple and comprehensive language in which the American people have asserted their national sovereignty.

Two gentlemen, Mr. Speaker, to whom I have listened with very great respect, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR,] whom I always hear with great respect, and my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] argued the purpose of this clause in the Constitution authorizing Congress to regulate commerce among the several States was to prevent the imposing of duties by one State upon merchandise in its transit to another. These gentlemen, however, overlooked the fact, both of them, that this matter of duties was expressly provided for elsewhere in the Constitution. The Constitution enacts, first, that no duties on exports shall be imposed by anybody; and secondly, that no duty on imports shall be imposed by any State without the consent of Congress, and when imposed the duty shall be paid into the national Treasury. So that, in inserting in addition the general authority to regulate commerce, the framers of the Constitution had something else in view than protecting the business of one State from duties or imposts levied on it in its transit through another in the form of a duty or impost.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what was that purpose? Let Mr. Madison, the great State-rights man of the convention which framed that Constitution, answer. Mr. Madison says, in the forty-second number of the Federalist:

> To the proofs and remarks which former papers have brought into view on this subject, it may be added that without this supplemental provision, the great and essential power of regulating foreign commerce would have been incomplete and ineffectual.
> A very material object of this power was the relief of the States which import and export through other States, from the improper contributions levied on them by the latter. Were these at liberty to regulate the trade between State and State, it must be foreseen that ways would be found out to load the articles of import and export, during the passage through their jurisdiction, with duties which would fall on the makers of the latter and the consumers of the former. We may be assured, by past experience, that such a practice would be introduced by future contrivances; and both by that and a common knowledge of human affairs that it would nourish unceasing animosities, and not improbably terminate in serious interruptions of the public tranquillity. To those who do not view the question through the medium of passion or of interest, the desire of the commercial States to collect, in any form, an indirect revenue from their uncommercial neighbors, must appear not less impolitic than it is unfair, since it would stimulate the injured party, by resentment as well as interest, to resort to less convenient channels for their foreign trade. But the mild voice of reason, pleading the cause of an enlarged and permanent interest, is but too often drowned before public bodies as well as individuals by the clamors of an impatient avidity for immediate and immoderate gain.
> The necessity of a superintending authority over the reciprocal trade of confederated states has been illustrated by other examples as well as our own. In Switzerland, where the union is so very slight, each canton is obliged to allow to merchandises a passage through its jurisdiction into other cantons without an augmentation of the tolls. In Germany it is a law of the empire that the princes and states shall not lay tolls or customs on bridges, rivers, or passages without the consent of the Emperor and Diet; though it appears from a quotation in an antecedent paper that the practice in this, as in many other instances in that confederacy, has not followed the law, and has produced there the mischiefs which have been foreseen here. Among the restraints imposed by the union of the Netherlands, on its members, one is, that they shall not establish imposts disadvantageous to their neighbors without the general permission.

So, Mr. Speaker, the House will see that, according to the declaration of Mr. Madison, this clause was put in the Constitution to prevent new devices which might thereafter be contrived, other than the imposition of duties or imposts, by which one State should burden on its passage to the sea the merchandise or commerce of another and drive that merchandise around by circuitous paths. If Mr. Madison had foreseen the present railroad system of the country he could not have more aptly described the evil which might be contrived in the future, which that general provision of the Constitution was intended to cure by giving this power to Congress, than he has by that language in the Federalist.

The law gives to the carrier a lien on the merchandise which he transports. I am at a loss to understand the logic of those gentlemen who argue that a State should not be permitted to impose a tax or duty on merchandise carried through it to other States, and yet insist that it should be at liberty, when it commits to any of its citizens its power of eminent domain, to authorize them to construct and control public highways over which, from the necessities of trade, merchandise must pass or not be transported at all, and allow them to impose on such merchandise liens unlimited except by the sense of their own interests on the part of those who impose them. Yet the framers of the Constitution meant, in the opinion of my friend from Kentucky, to prevent the imposition of a tax by a State for its own benefit, and yet allow it to delegate to a corporation the power to impose a like tax for the benefit of a part, and not the whole.

These gentlemen, in their endeavor to fritter and explain away the simple, clear, and comprehensive language of the Constitution, and deny its true meaning, find themselves obliged to admit the power they seek to destroy. The gentleman from Kentucky says that the object of this constitutional provision was to secure to commerce "the charity of being let alone." Has it not occurred to that gentleman that our forefathers, usually so exact, adopted the most extraordinary language to accomplish such an end? In order that commerce might not have rules prescribed to it, but might be free, unrestricted, without regulation except by its own will, the Constitution, according to him, creates a tribunal upon which it confers the power to regulate it. The gentleman from Kentucky says that by the Constitution they created a legislative tribunal, and directed and authorized it to prescribe rules. The purpose of putting that clause in the Constitution was to his mind in order that these rules might not be prescribed. Mr. Speaker, the position of gentlemen on the other side, in short, is exactly this: that the Constitution gives Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States, in order that commerce might forever not be regulated so far as it is commerce among the States.

It is objected that the carriage of merchandise across the continent from point to point, in distant States, is, when analyzed, nothing but a series of successive acts of transport, by which each railroad carries the freight within its own State only, and is paid only for such carriage; that the collecting the freight in one sum, to be divided proportionably among the roads, is for the convenience of the shipper, and does not make the roads a unit, or change the essence of the transaction. This is the precise argument which was urged and overruled in Gibbons vs. Ogden. It was said by Mr. Oakley:

> The right of a State to regulate its internal trade applies as well to its navigable waters as to its other territory. * * * Is the law in question anything more than a regulation of the internal navigation of the waters of the State? It does not deny the right of entry into its waters to any vessels. It only forbids such vessels, when within its waters, to be moved by steam. It is, therefore, strictly a regulation of internal navigation.

And by Mr. Emmet:

> The Federal Government can do no act on the navigable waters within the limits of the United States which, or a corresponding act to which, it cannot do on the land within the same limits.

To this reasoning it was replied by Chief Justice Marshall:

> Commerce, as the word is used in the Constitution, is a unit. * * * Commerce among the States cannot stop at the external boundary line of each State, but may be introduced into the interior. * * * Can a trading expedition between two adjoining States commence and terminate outside of each? And if the trading intercourse be between two States remote from each other, must it not commence in one, terminate in another, and probably pass through a third?

Mr. Speaker, I wish to answer now two or three objections of detail. My friend from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] says that the policy of law requires that it should be uniform, but that it is impossible that uniform rates should be established by this tribunal. But the uniformity is in the rule which prescribes that the rates should be reasonable. The law that says that every citizen may recover on a quantum meruit from his employer the reasonable value of his services is clearly a uniform law, although the value of the services varies in every case which comes before the court. It is the uniformity of the rule, not the application.

But it is said that we are undertaking to delegate legislative powers to this commission. Not at all. We enact that the common-law obligation, which rests upon the public carrier everywhere else to charge no more than a reasonable price and to make no unjust discrimination, shall rest upon him also while he engages in commerce among the States by railroad. We might very properly further provide, that in enforcing this rule by legal proceedings the burden of proof of reasonableness should in all cases be upon the carrier, who is familiar with the subject and who has all the facts in his possession. But we do not go so far as that. We provide that the burden of showing reasonableness shall rest upon him only when he has exceeded the rate fixed in the commissioners' schedule. This confers no legislative power upon the commission. The rule of law by which the parties must abide, and which determines their rights, is enacted by Congress and applied by the court. The commission is merely an aid in determining the fact of reasonableness.

I think the argument against this bill which presses the hardest on the minds of gentlemen otherwise friendly to it is that it gives vast powers to these commissioners, who may be weak, who may be corrupt, who may be the servants of the railroad. But, Mr. Speaker, the felicity of this bill is this: that there is no possibility that these commissioners can do any harm. If they do nothing but make complete compilation of the railroad statistics of the United States they will be worth all their salaries. But what can a railroad corruptly induce this commission to do? Suppose that the commission, acting corruptly, will not put down the rates on any line of railroad; the people are exactly where they are now. If they put down the rates on all other lines, then the freight will go by those other lines, and the railroad corrupting the commissioners will be left without employment. If they put down the rates on one line, no competing line will have gained anything by corrupting the commission. We may have lost the salaries of the commissioners, but that is all. It is impossible for human ingenuity to conceive a case where a railroad could corrupt these commissioners in a manner that could do any possible harm to the public.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Might not the commissioners make the rates too low?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Yes, sir. But if the commissioners fix them too low the railroad may still go to a jury. This commission simply changes the burden of proof in a suit between the railroad and the shipper of goods, and says that if the railroads go beyond a reasonable rate, the rate fixed by these commissioners, they shall be liable for extortion. The railroad company may always protect itself by going to a jury; but if a railroad or a combination of railroad companies has corrupted the commissioners so that they do not put down the rates low enough, why the citizens do not get the benefit of changing the burden of proof in their suits, and the bill in that particular does no good. But it does no possible harm. Some gentlemen seem to suppose that these commissioners will put up the rates beyond the point to which such competition as exists would bring the rates and charges down. Not at all; the railroad companies can get no possible advantage in making an overcharge by corrupting the commissioners.

My friends, however, who use this argument seem to me to make an argument which, if legislators of America bring themselves to act upon it, involves the surrender of the Republic itself. No statesman, in my judgment, will ever lead the American people, no statesman will ever be useful to the American people, no statesman will ever apprehend the sublime forces or the sublime destiny of this Republic who does not learn, in spite of evils, in spite of mistakes, in spite of corruption, to trust the Republic and the ideas which are its strength and safety. We have planted upon this continent a people who believe that, whatever may be the frailties or vices of men, justice, equality, righteousness, will eventually be wrought out by freedom; who believe that the governing forces of the Republic may be safely wielded by the intelligence of a free people. When that fundamental maxim is forgotten, you have no alternative but to go back to the despotism from which our fathers escaped.

Gentlemen, however, will remember that the powers which this bill creates are powers of the courts and jury. The commissioners but change the burden of proof; that is all. The ultimate power, the ultimate administration, the ultimate strength of this bill rests in the confidence which Congress is willing to put in the jury who are to try the cases and in the courts who are ultimately to declare the law.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to say one word in regard to a proposition which has been made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH] to substitute for the present bill a bill which seems to me not only to be extremely unjust to the railroads, but to be utterly impracticable in application.

His bill provides simply that railroad companies shall in all cases charge the same rate for the same kind of freight carried the same distance. It ought to be entitled "A bill to prevent a railroad from even putting down its prices in any case." For instance, you have the centennial celebration coming off in Philadelphia. Under the gentleman's bill no railroad could bring any merchandise to that city at half price for the celebration. The Pennsylvania Central is a part of the line running from San Francisco to Philadelphia, and it would have to charge, under the iron and inflexible rule of the bill proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, the same rate on freight from San Francisco to Philadelphia that it would for bringing some machinery four miles from the suburbs. It would have to charge the same price for bringing freight from fifty miles eastward from Omaha as for carrying freight fifty miles westward from the city of New York.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. The gentleman entirely misunderstands the bill.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I have it here, and have read it very carefully. Let me see what it provides:

> That no railroad company shall make any discrimination in its rate of charges between persons doing business with such company for the transportation of a like amount of freight, of like class, for a like distance, over the line or connecting lines of railroad owned or operated by it, when such freight is being transported from one State to another, or to or from any foreign nation.

What I said would not apply to freight brought into Philadelphia from any part of Pennsylvania, but it would apply to freight brought to Philadelphia from New Jersey.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Not at all.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Well, that is the plain meaning of the bill. But there is another point. The gentleman's bill wholly overlooks one great fact in railroad transportation, and it is this: The freight-cars upon a railroad going one way may be full, while in going the other way they may be largely empty, and a railroad company ought to have the right in determining the rates of freight going over their road to consider the fact that there will, of course, be a great dearth of freight going in one direction and a superabundance of it going in the other. This bill utterly prohibits any such consideration from entering into the rates of freight. It prohibits a railroad company from making any terms whatever by which a person sending a very large amount of freight may contract by the year, or for the transportation of an unusually large amount. It is a simple, inflexible, iron rule. A similar law, as I am informed by the gentleman from Illinois, has been declared unconstitutional by the supreme court of the State of Illinois. That court has held to be unconstitutional a bill framed on the principle of this bill of the gentleman from Ohio.

I had designed, Mr. Speaker, to add something on one or two other points, but I think I ought not to detain the House longer at this time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 2651) reappropriating certain unexpended balances of appropriations for removal of Indians; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1954) granting a pension to Henry B. Ryder.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 548) granting a pension to Christiana Bailey;

A bill (S. No. 566) granting a pension to Lucinda Schrum, widow of Jacob R. Schrum, late of Company A, Forty-ninth Regiment Missouri Volunteers;

A bill (S. No. 567) granting a pension to Mary E. Naylor, widow of Osborn Naylor, late a private in Company C, Second Kansas Volunteers; and

A bill (S. No. 568) granting a pension to Hugh P. Lytle, late a private in Company H, Thirty-second Regiment Ohio Volunteers.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill in relation to commerce by railroad among the several States.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, in view of the very able debate that has transpired upon this bill, I approach this subject with unusual embarrassment. The debate has now been progressing for weeks, and the subject has been so thoroughly discussed that I would not now occupy any of the time of the House but for the fact that the section of country from which I come is perhaps more interested than any other in the question of cheap transportation. It is the great producing section, and its distance from the sea-board renders it imperative that it shall have large facilities and cheap rates for transportation.

I am one of those who believe that the Constitution of the United States gives to Congress absolute power to regulate commerce not only with foreign nations but among the several States. I shall not to-day take time to go into an elaborate argument on the constitutional power of Congress, and to cite authorities to prove the position which I assume, for that has been thoroughly done by those who have preceded me. It seems to me it has been shown, if anything can be shown, that the Supreme Court of the United States has often held that the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is fully and absolutely vested in Congress. I believe this has been established, if anything can be established. And the question now to be determined by this Congress is this: Will Congress exercise the power with which it is vested by the Constitution of the United States for the purpose of controlling the great railroad system of this country?

It was said by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ARTHUR] in arguing this question, in opposition to the bill, that one of the leading causes, in fact the leading cause, which led to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States was the desire on the part of the American people to vest in Congress the power to control commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. That I may not misrepresent the gentleman I will quote from his remarks as published in the RECORD.

He said:

> Two of the major evils which it was especially designed to remedy were, first commercial restrictions at home; and, secondly, commercial restrictions abroad. Free and untrammeled commerce among the States and with foreign nations formed the paramount object to be promoted. Freedom, fairness, competition, and equality, combine the influences under which it was known to achieve its greatest triumphs.
> The States had pursued systems of retaliatory restrictions upon each other, which uniformly resulted in adversity to their own commerce, and in prosperity to that of rival powers.
> Before the Constitution existed the States taxed the commerce and intercourse of each other. This was the leading cause of abandoning the Confederation and forming the Constitution; more than all other causes it led to the result. (Mr. Justice Catron in the Passenger cases in 1849.)

The gentleman from Kentucky, speaking in opposition to this bill, in a very carefully prepared speech, informs this House that the leading cause, the cause of causes, which led to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States was the desire on the part of the States to be rid of the old Confederation, and to have the power vested in the Congress of the United States, over and above all other power within the limits of this country, to control commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. Yet, notwithstanding this admission, the gentleman proceeded but a very little way in his speech before he said that this power was modified; that a part of this power was still retained by the several States, and that the States had, from time to time at least, partially exercised this power; and I think he referred to Mr. Madison and others as showing the opinion of the men of that time, showing the views which they held in reference to this power of Congress to control commerce.

I hold in my hand the address of the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States, and which accompanied that Constitution when it was transmitted from the convention which framed it to the old Congress, then in session. That address, as appears upon its face, was adopted by the unanimous vote of the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States, and is signed by George Washington, the president of the convention. From that address I read as follows:

> The friends of our country have long seen and desired that the power of making war, peace, and treaties; that of levying money, and regulating commerce, and the correspondent executive and judicial authorities, should be fully and effectually vested in the General Government of the Union; but the impropriety of delegating such extensive trust to one body of men is evident; hence results the necessity of a different organization.

That is to say, the organization differed from that which had existed under the old Confederation, dividing the powers of the General Government into the executive, legislative, and judicial. I read further:

> In all our deliberations on this subject we kept steadily in our view that which appears to us the greatest interest of every true American—the consolidation of our Union—in which is involved our prosperity, felicity, safety, perhaps our national existence. This important consideration seriously and deeply impressed on our minds, led each State in the convention to be less rigid on points of inferior magnitude than might been otherwise expected; and thus the Constitution which we now present is the result of a spirit of amity, and of that mutual deference and concession which the peculiarity of our political situation rendered indispensable.

Sir, it was to consolidate the Union that the Constitution of the United States was adopted. It was adopted, because under the old Articles of Confederation the central Government had not sufficient power, and it was for the purpose of vesting in the Government of the United States these great powers which should always inhere in an independent government, the power to raise money, to levy taxes, to raise armies, to make war and to make peace—it was to vest all these great powers in the Government of the United States that the Constitution of the United States was adopted.

The convention, it will be observed, declare in the address from which I quote that it was the purpose to fully and effectually vest in the General Government the power of regulating commerce. Whatever powers were reserved to the States or the people, this, in the opinion of the convention that framed the Constitution, was not one of them.

In speaking of the power of Congress over the subject of commerce, the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, use this language:

> It is the power to regulate, that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself; may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution. These are expressed in plain terms, and do not affect the questions which arise in this case, and which have been discussed at the bar. If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as in a single government having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States.

Now, I venture to say that there has never been a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, from the time when this question was first raised until now, which contravened the position I take upon this subject.

The great case of Gibbons vs. Ogden has been often referred to in this debate. It has been referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ARTHUR] and the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. SCUDDER.] It has been referred to by many gentlemen who have spoken in favor of the pending proposition. In that case the Supreme Court of the United States held that the whole power over the subject of commerce with foreign nations and among the several States was absolutely vested in the Congress of the United States; that it could not be divided; that the words found in the Constitution showed that it was clearly the intention of the framers of the Constitution to vest in Congress the power absolutely to control commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. But it is said by gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to this bill that this is too great a power to be vested in Congress; that Congress might abuse the power. The same may be said of every power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. Who shall limit the power of Congress to declare war? Suppose when Congress convened in December last it had declared war against Spain in view of the disturbance arising out of the Virginius affair. Of course it would have been a piece of folly to have done so; but certainly Congress had the power. No man will gainsay that Congress has the power to raise money to any extent by taxing the people. It may levy too many taxes and raise too much money. It may not always display the highest wisdom in the exercise of this power. But the power is absolute and unlimited. So the Supreme Court of the United States held in the great case of Gibbons vs. Ogden. It said that Congress had the absolute power to declare war and to raise armies; that nobody could deny that power; and though Congress might abuse it, the only restraint placed upon its exercise was the control of the people over those whom they may send here to represent them. If they should send men to Congress who misrepresent them, who have not the virtue or the patriotism to discharge their duty, they may remedy the difficulty in electing another Congress. But that is the only power which, under our Government, can limit or restrain Congress in exercising these powers granted to it by the Constitution of the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose to call attention to the legislation of Congress upon this subject. It is a field, I believe, into which no gentleman has entered who has addressed the House upon either side. I shall endeavor to show that Congress in its legislation heretofore has assumed to control the railroads of this country which form lines of travel and intercourse among or between the several States. It was said yesterday by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] that there was power in the several States to charter railroad companies and to limit the exercise of the powers granted to any extent which they saw fit; and if I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] in the remarks he has made to-day, he holds to the same doctrine—that a State Legislature may create a railroad corporation, and limit its power, so that the corporation created by the Legislature of the State may never carry over its road a pound of freight or a passenger being transported from one State to another. I submit to this House if it be the law that a Legislature may exercise that power, how shall Congress exercise the power of regulating commerce to any extent among the several States as carried on by railroads chartered by the States? If the State of New Jersey, or Pennsylvania, or any other State of this Union, can say that it will charter but one road to pass over its territory for the transportation of interstate commerce, and that no other road shall have power or authority to carry commerce passing from one State to another over the territory of such State, how can Congress step in and exercise the greater power of repealing or annulling the law which has been made by the State Legislature? I shall endeavor to show (and I think I can do so conclusively) that Congress has passed upon this question on full and deliberate consideration; that it has passed a law declaring it is not in the power of any State to charter a railroad company that shall not have power to carry across the borders of the State, and over the territory of the State, commerce of the other States seeking transit over its territory. The Legislature cannot create a railroad corporation with power to transport local State commerce and at the same time prohibit it from transporting interstate commerce. It cannot prohibit the railroad company from transporting interstate commerce over its road, for the reason that interstate commerce is beyond the control of State authority.

When the Legislature has created a railroad corporation, and its road is constructed, it becomes a public highway for the transportation of commerce, and the railroad company becomes a common carrier; and when the road has become a public highway and the railroad company a common carrier, it does not matter by what authority Congress will step in and exercise its authority to control the interstate commerce transported by it and leave to the State the control of that which is purely local or within the State.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this subject first came here, so far as I know, in 1864, and I call the especial attention of every gentleman present to this subject, because I regard it as of the utmost importance and as really settling the question now presented by this bill.

In 1864 the Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company, of New Jersey, presented its petition to Congress, asking for legislative relief against the Camden and Amboy Railroad, of New Jersey, which claimed to have the sole right to transport freight and passengers on their way from the city of Philadelphia to the city of New York. The Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company set up in its petition that it was claimed by the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company that the latter company had the only authority and the only right to transport commerce on its way from one State to another across the State of New Jersey; and it asked Congress to relieve it, by the exercise of that power given by the Constitution of the United States, from the oppression of the Camden and Amboy Company and of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs of the House; and that committee presented its report on the 9th day of March, 1864. I call the attention of the House to the points made in that report, to show what were the facts and the law upon which the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company claimed the power to prevent the Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company from transporting freight and passengers from Philadelphia to the city of New York.

I will read from the report of the committee to the House:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of the Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company, respectfully report:

The petitioners pray that their roads and the boats connected with them may be declared post and military roads of the United States.

The committee find that the petitioners have completed a road of sixty-five miles in length, from Port Monmouth, near Sandy Hook, to Atsion, nearly east of the city of Philadelphia; and that they also have the control of the Camden and Atlantic Railroad Company; and that the two roads are connected by the Batsto branch of the Camden and Atlantic Railroad Company; and that by means of these roads, and boats on Raritan Bay and the Delaware River, a continuous through line is constituted between the cities of New York and Philadelphia.

The committee find that since the petition was brought before this committee the chancellor of New Jersey, at the suit of the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, has enjoined the use of the petitioners' roads, except for local purposes, and has ordered that the Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company pay to the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company all sums collected by the former for through business, including the amount received for transportation of troops; and that the chancellor decreed that the petitioners' road had no right to carry, or aid in carrying, passengers and freight between New York and Philadelphia.

The committee find that the act of the State of New Jersey, by authority of which the petitioners have been enjoined from carrying on their roads passengers and freights between New York and Philadelphia, is as follows:

"That it shall not be lawful, at any time during the said railroad charter, (to wit, the Camden and Amboy,) to construct any other railroads in this State without the consent of the said companies, which shall be intended or used for the transportation of passengers or merchandise between the cities of New York and Philadelphia, or to compete in business with the railroad authorized by the act to which this supplement is relative."—New Jersey Session Laws for 1854, page 387.

The committee find that from the 1st of September, 1862, to the 1st of June, 1863, there were transported from New York to Philadelphia, over the petitioners' road, 17,428 men, 649 horses, and 806,245 pounds of freight, under the orders of the Government.

After citing the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, the committee proceed as follows:

It clearly appears, from the various opinions given in these celebrated cases, that the power to regulate commerce is absolutely exclusive in Congress, so that no State can constitutionally enact laws or any regulation of commerce between the States, whether Congress has exercised the same power in question or left it free.

The inference from the various cases cited is that New Jersey, by the law above quoted, and by virtue of which she is attempting to destroy the franchises of the petitioners, has usurped the jurisdiction of Congress, and that we are authorized to interfere to prevent that usurpation from abridging one of the means of communication between New York and Philadelphia.

The committee proceed further to show the necessity for the exercise of this power by Congress, for the purpose of securing another line of transportation across the State of New Jersey, in opposition to the Camden and Amboy Railroad:

The committee come now to consider the question whether the present application presents a proper case for the exercise of the powers which it has already been shown Congress possesses. In answering this question it should be borne in mind that the exercise of this power is invoked not only by the petitioners, but also by the Government, and by the traveling and trading community, who now earnestly seek new channels of communication between New York and Washington. It appears by a letter addressed by General Meigs to the special committee investigating the propriety of establishing a new railroad between here and New York, that the Government requires not only all the available means, but additional facilities, for the transportation of troops and munitions of war over the line which is partly covered by the roads of the petitioners, and that it has more than once been constrained to relieve the existing lines by water conveyance of troops to the capital. It also appears that during the recent freezing of the Potomac, the insufficiency of our means of transportation for military purposes was painfully apparent, and I have already stated that on one memorable occasion, when great promptness and great exertions were required, the petitioners greatly aided the Government in the conveyance of troops and warlike material to the seat of war, and their reward has been an injunction from through transportation, and an order to account to the Camden and Amboy Company for the money which they received for this service. No matter how urgent the emergency; no matter how imperative the demand of the Army for re-enforcements, the roads of the petitioners are now closed, not only against the Government, but against the citizens of every State; and troops, munitions of war, and travelers, are only permitted to pass from New York to Philadelphia over the roads of the monopoly. The quartermaster's department of the city of New York a few days ago applied to the petitioners to transport a regiment to Philadelphia, and the application was denied, because such transportation had been enjoined by the chancellor of New Jersey.

In this connection it is worthy of remark that since the injunction the rates of traffic upon the Camden and Amboy Railroad have been unexpectedly and suddenly advanced. * * * * * * *

Under the facts already stated, the question presented by the applicants resolves itself into this: Is it expedient for Congress to authorize a road which was legally constructed under proper State authority, and which has a legal right to transport passengers and merchandise from the Delaware River to Raritan Bay, to commence such transportation from the city of Philadelphia, on the opposite side of the Delaware, and continue it to the city of New York, on the opposite shore of the Raritan? The necessities of the Government, the necessities of the public, and the absolute rights of commercial intercourse, all require that this question should be answered in the affirmative.

The Committee on Military Affairs therefore unanimously recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. Speaker, the House will see from the report made by the Committee on Military Affairs in 1864 that the Legislature of the State of New Jersey had declared by law that the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company should have the exclusive right to carry passengers and freight across that State, and that no other railroad could exercise that right except by permission of the Camden and Amboy Railroad. The Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company it seems did transport troops and munitions of war by order of the Government of the United States, but afterward the chancellor of that State, as will be seen, compelled that railroad to pay to the Camden and Amboy Railroad all the moneys it had received for that service, and granted an injunction to restrain it in the future.

Accompanying this report was a bill presented from the Military Committee to the House, providing that the Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company should be declared a public highway; that it should have power to transport passengers and property on that road from Philadelphia, through the State of New Jersey, to the city of New York. That was a specific bill for the relief of this particular company against that great monopoly. The House adopted a substitute, however, which is substantially like the law of 1866, which was passed in the Thirty-ninth Congress.

Now, I will read the law of 1866 to show what Congress has done on this subject. The House in the Thirty-eighth Congress passed the bill substantially as it now stands in the act of 1866, without the proviso.

The act of June 15, 1866, is as follows:

That every railroad company in the United States, whose road is operated by steam, its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to carry upon and over its roads, boats, bridges, and ferries all passengers, troops, Government supplies, mails, freight, and property on their way from any State to another State, and to receive compensation therefor, and to connect with roads of other States, so as to form continuous lines for the transportation of the same to the place of destination.

This act of June 15, 1866, was introduced into the House in the Thirty-ninth Congress by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] now chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and was referred to the Committee on Commerce. It was reported from the committee unanimously, as appears from the Globe. It passed the House, after a long and able discussion, by a nearly two-thirds vote. It went to the Senate, but afterward, on motion of Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, was recalled from the Senate for the purpose of placing upon it the proviso which is now found in the statute, the proviso being intended simply to secure the rights of the Government in reference to roads to which land grants had been made. It declares that all railroads in the United States shall have power to form connecting lines with roads of other States, and to transport over those roads passengers and freight on their way from one State to another State, and further, to receive compensation therefor. That, Mr. Speaker, was the object sought by the law; to say to the State of New Jersey, and to every other State of the Union, "You have not the power simply to charter one or more roads and say that no more shall exist without your permission, to carry freight and passengers on their way from one State to another."

Now I submit to the House the question, what power is there on the part of these State roads to form these connections and to constitute these through lines without the action of Congress? Congress comes in and by affirmative legislation declares that these roads shall have the power without regard to the action of the States; and what was the result? It gave to this road, which was deprived by the law of the State of New Jersey and the decisions of her courts of the right to carry passengers and freight from one State to another, that right; and that road and every other in the United States may now exercise that right notwithstanding the Legislature of New Jersey and the highest courts of New Jersey declared that the power did not exist.

I submit, then, in all candor, to every gentleman in this House, has not Congress exercised the power to regulate interstate commerce by railroad? By virtue of what law do these roads receive compensation to-day for transporting through freight and passengers from one State to another? By virtue of this statute which I hold in my hand, and which I have just read in the hearing of this House. They may form connections, and they may form through lines and receive the compensation which they could not do without the act of Congress, and which the State of New Jersey forbade a railroad to receive.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what more do we propose by the bill before the House?

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the gentleman will allow me, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Although I do not concede the power to pass that law which the gentleman has referred to, and which I remember being discussed in the Thirty-eighth Congress, yet is there not a manifest distinction between that law and the bill now under consideration? Is not the one in the interest of freeing commerce and of taking away restrictions, while the other is in the direction of the limitation and enslaving of commerce?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Does the gentleman mean that the bill now pending is a limitation on commerce?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I say that the bill now pending is, in my judgment, a limitation on commerce. It is in the direction of restricting and enslaving commerce.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I did not yield for an argument; I yielded for a question merely. Now the point I make on that statute is this: I say that Congress has acted on this question. It has deliberately, after due consideration, declared, in regard to the State railroads chartered by State authority, exercising their powers by virtue of the power given them by the Legislature—notwithstanding that there may be a restriction in the charters prohibiting them from forming lines of connection with railroads in other States and carrying freight on its way from one State to another; notwithstanding the State, by its highest judicial authority, has declared that the Legislature had the power to make the prohibition—Congress has declared that that prohibition shall not exist, and that they may receive compensation.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] says that the pending bill will lay a restriction upon commerce. I say no; and I will show the gentleman, I think, before I conclude, that I am right in saying so. He will say, with the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. SCUDDER,] that commerce, as carried on by railroad, should be free from control by Congress, and should be left to the States. The gentleman from New Jersey the other day, in addressing the House, said that the effect of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden was to declare that commerce is and should be free. "Hands off," is his expression. We propose, Mr. Speaker, to say by this bill, in continuation of the law we have already passed, "hands shall be off;" neither the State Legislatures nor the State courts can lay a restriction upon commerce; neither the State of New Jersey, nor the State of Pennsylvania, nor the State of New York can by its State Legislature lay a restriction upon the commerce of the people of the Northwest, the people of the State of Illinois, from which State I come, the people of Wisconsin, from which the gentleman who interrupted me a moment ago comes, when the commerce of those States is seeking an outlet to the sea-board.

We propose to say not only to the States that they shall not lay restrictions upon commerce, but we propose to say to these giant corporations, you shall not do it. We propose to make commerce free. That is the very object of the bill, and should be the object of all legislation upon this great subject. Does the gentleman tell me that it is the object of those having this bill in charge to lay a restriction upon commerce so that freights shall be higher and there shall be greater difficulty in getting productions from the interior to the sea-board? I am sure if he does he is not borne out by the facts.

But to return to the point. Congress declared by that law that these railroad companies should have power to form continuous lines, and to receive compensation for transportation over those lines. We go now but one step further. We say that that compensation shall be reasonable. Sir, if we had the power to pass that law and say that they should receive compensation, may we not say that that compensation shall not be extortionate, unjust, and unreasonable? That is all we propose by this bill.

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] tells us that the State Legislatures may regulate this matter, because they chartered the roads. I concede, Mr. Speaker, that the State Legislature may regulate the transportation of all commerce which is entirely within the limits of the State; it may do that; but whenever it assumes to control commerce between the several States, whether it be transported by a creature of its own creation or not, it must not lay its hand upon that transportation. So Congress declared in the passage of the bill to which I have referred, and so the Supreme Court of the United States has held over and over again. How else can you interpret the decision of the Supreme Court which has been so often referred to here in the case known as the State freight tax, the case of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad vs. The State of Pennsylvania? The State of Pennsylvania had laid a tax upon all freight passing over the railroads of that State. If it be true, as contended by the gentleman from Vermont, that the States themselves can regulate all commerce both internal and among the several States, the State of Pennsylvania had the power to lay that tonnage tax. But what does the Supreme Court of the United States say to the State of Pennsylvania? It says you have no power to lay a tonnage tax upon all the commerce passing through your State, because a great part of that commerce comes from points without your borders and is merely being transported across your State on its way to the sea-board or from the sea-board. That is what the Supreme Court said in that case, and no man will deny that I correctly interpret the decision.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that that was in the interest and in the direction of freeing commerce; and this bill, as I claim, is a restriction on commerce.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Not at all; the gentleman is very much mistaken. How can it be said to be a restriction on commerce when we propose to regulate commerce, as the gentleman must concede, in the interest of the great body of the people? The Supreme Court of the United States say that no power exists in a State to lay its hand upon this commerce.

Mr. ELDREDGE. This bill takes this power away from the Legislatures of thirty-seven States, and puts it in the hands of an autocratic commission of nine men selected by the President of the United States.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin says that the bill takes this power away from thirty-seven States, and vests it in a commission. Sir, the gentleman loses sight of this fact, that none of the States in this Union, unless it be the State of Illinois and possibly one or two others, in their recent action, have ever attempted to regulate commerce that they have not really laid heavy burdens upon it. Sir, what else was meant by the action of the State of Pennsylvania when it laid its hand on the commerce of Illinois passing over its borders? The Supreme Court says that a State cannot lay its hand upon that commerce, because if it lays its hand on it to tax it, or regulate it at all, it may annihilate it. Tell me that a State may regulate commerce on its way from Illinois to New York and you tell me that it may oppress it, that it may lay on it any tax it may see fit.

Sir, what did the State of New Jersey do? It declared that not one ton of freight and not one passenger or soldier should pass across that State except upon the Camden and Amboy road, in which the State was a large owner and stockholder.

Mr. ARTHUR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a single question?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I have but an hour, and I cannot yield.

Mr. ARTHUR. I merely desire to call the gentleman's attention to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the Reading Railroad Company vs. The State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The gentleman has referred to that, and quoted the decision in his speech, and I must decline to yield to have it read now; I have not time. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that whenever the States on the sea-board have sought to regulate commerce they have invariably laid burdens upon it. Did not the gentleman from Kentucky, in the elaborate speech which he made here, declare that one of the main objects for which the framers of the Constitution placed this power in the hands of Congress was to take it away from the States? He says that the Constitution of the United States was framed for that reason, not only more than any other, but more than all others. Now, whenever you concede the right of the States to control this interstate commerce you have yielded everything, because whenever you admit they may control it, they may lay heavy burdens upon it, and the history of the legislation of the country shows that uniformly when they have attempted to regulate commerce between the States they have laid restrictions upon that commerce and have not sought to liberate it.

I repeat that we are simply following in the line which has been before adopted by Congress in reference to this subject. Congress has assumed this power to control commerce among the several States. Will it be contended that the several States can control commerce between the United States and foreign nations? Can they lay their hands upon that power? Can they exercise it? The Supreme Court has said, in every decision it has ever made upon the subject, that the power to regulate commerce among the several States was as absolute and complete in Congress as the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. Will any one say that the States have the right to control commerce with foreign nations? If they have it in any degree they have it all.

I have shown from the address of the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States, and which was adopted by the unanimous vote of the convention, that one of the great objects for which the Constitution of the United States was framed was to give to Congress control over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and to take it away from the States.

I now call attention for a moment to the discussion which occurred upon this subject in Congress in 1864. I will show to the House that the gentlemen who then opposed the bill which became a law in 1866 opposed it with much more earnestness and much more zeal than any gentleman has displayed in opposition to the pending bill in the course of this discussion. They then declared, as the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. SCUDDER,] the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR,] and the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD,] and many others who have spoken against this bill have declared, that it was interfering with the rights of States; that it was taking away from the States the exercise of those rights and powers which had been reserved to them; that it was a usurpation on the part of Congress to exercise this power.

It cannot now be said that the law of 1866, although a general law, was not aimed at the very case which I have cited. It was so regarded by the gentlemen from New Jersey then representing that State upon this floor. And they made earnest appeals to this House in 1864 not to pass the bill. They were opposed to its becoming a law because they said it interfered with vested rights. And so these gentlemen who now oppose this bill propose to vote against it because, they say, it interferes with vested rights and with the rights of the States. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] when addressing us on yesterday said:

Do gentlemen claim that there is power on the part of Congress to do anything that shall interfere with vested rights, with contracts, and with decisions of the courts?

I read from the speech of Mr. Starr, of the State of New Jersey, in the course of debate in 1864, when this subject first came up. In addressing the House he used these words:

Here is a contract that has been affirmed and reaffirmed by the contracting parties, and by the courts whenever its validity has been questioned, and subject to this contract these corporations accepted their charters.

Now, sir, these companies come here asking Congress in defiance of the power creating them, against their own express obligations to the State of New Jersey that gave them existence, to violate the laws, the very laws of that State by virtue of which they exist. Will this House, without some overpowering necessity, take away, by the passage of this bill, the jurisdiction and power of the State itself over the corporations within her limits and of her own creating, and destroy the vested rights of the citizens of New Jersey, who hold their property by virtue of the laws of the State, now attempted to be thrust aside, not, as I believe, from any necessities of the country at this time, but rather to relieve the necessities of the English bondholders, who hold the $600,000 of the bonds of these corporations, now pressing the passage of this law?

I also read a paragraph from the speech of Mr. Rogers, from the same State, on this subject. Upon the same occasion he said:

This proposed legislation before the House is one that has never been proposed to the Congress of the United States before in the history of this country. It is an unusual and unprecedented attempt to transfer the power and jurisdiction of a State over its railroads and canals located solely within the lines of that State to the Halls of Congress, and to override and set at naught the decisions of the courts of New Jersey in reference to one of its own domestic railway systems, established by its own sovereign power within its own jurisdiction, and only on its own soil.

Further on in his remarks he uses this language:

The Legislature afterward, in 1854, chartered another railroad company, the Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad, (the other line named in this bill,) to construct a road from some suitable point on Raritan Bay, east of the village of Keyport, in the county of Monmouth, by the way of certain designated places, to Cape Island, on the Atlantic Ocean, for the purpose of doing local business between these two particular points. The charters of these roads were subject to the charter of the Camden and Amboy Railroad. These roads, when they accepted their charter, knew that they had no right to compete in business with the joint companies, and they took their charters with full knowledge of the exclusive privileges granted by the State to the joint companies.

After thus taking their charters, they come here to Congress and ask Representatives from Ohio, from New York, and other States, men of the East and men of the West, to trample upon the laws of the State of New Jersey, to trample upon the decisions of her courts, to destroy her domestic railroad communications, and place them under the sole jurisdiction of the United States!

I now call attention to the speech of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. SCUDDER,] made upon this floor a few days ago in opposition to this bill. Speaking then of the decision of the court in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, and in the other cases decided by the Supreme Court touching this subject, he said:

A great many things were said in that opinion, and a great many things said in other opinions pronounced by the Supreme Court of the United States and other learned tribunals; but when we come to examine every decision made by that high tribunal or any other tribunal on this subject, we may sum it all up in these few words: "You seek to impose restrictions on commerce; you cannot do it. Hands off; commerce is free." That is the upshot of it. That is all that was ever decided by any court. They have held that a passenger coming into the country could not be compelled to pay taxes by State authority. That was, "Hands off; commerce is free." They have held even a bill of lading, which represented interstate commerce or foreign commerce, could not be taxed by State law. Hands off!

Now, Mr. Speaker, this power has never, at any time, been exercised by fixing the rates for which common carriers could transport. Learned gentlemen may read extracts from opinions and learned essays on this subject, but when we come to find the particular subject-matter which has been adjudged, there is no case which declares that the business of transportation can be regulated by Congress by fixing the rates.

Again, he uses this language:

We have steam navigation from State to State, and coastwise from State to State. Has Congress ever attempted to fix the rates of steam navigation? You must consider, so far as the States are concerned, they have reserved the right in their charters to limit the rates, and the companies incorporated have accepted the contracts as granted by the State Legislature. They are contracts, and have been accepted, and accepted with these conditions, that the State can regulate them. According to this bill, though by the contract the State can regulate the rates of fares, it is sought to transfer to another tribunal outside of the State this very power of fixing the rates, and that produces at once conflict between State authority and the authority of the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have shown that Congress has already interposed, and has entirely overturned, not only the legislation of the State of New Jersey, but the most solemn decisions of her courts, so far as this question is concerned.

The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR,] in discussing this question, said:

A cursory survey of the statute laws of the States will demonstrate innumerable instances of very important regulations materially affecting commerce. The details would expand into a mass. Those laws stand, and have stood, through every vicissitude. Instances of a familiar class are apparent. On and over navigable waters they have created and regulated steamboat and other commercial companies, and exclusive ferry franchises, which more or less interrupt or appropriate the freedom of navigation. Over land they have authorized and regulated roads of every description, canals, and stage and transportation lines for passengers and freight, which commonly intersect continuous routes at the boundaries of adjoining States. Over all these, and all other species of highways, their sovereignty has operated unchallenged by any questions of repugnancy to Federal power.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is objected by gentlemen who have spoken against this bill, and by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] in his interruptions to my remarks, that it is proposed to transfer power from the several States and place it in the hands of commissioners. Sir, what security has this country that commerce will be controlled in the interest of the people if the thirty-seven States now in existence, and perhaps a hundred in time to come, are to control this subject? If the commerce of this great and growing country is to be placed in the hands of the several States, they will, as I have already shown, exercise this power not for the benefit of the States and people generally, but each State will exercise the power for its own benefit, as was the case before the Constitution of the United States was adopted, when the evil became so great and alarming that the people fled from the then existing government and put the power to control this subject in the proper branch of the General Government, the Congress of the United States.

Mr. ELDREDGE. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I decline to be interrupted; I have not the time.

It has been said, not only by the gentleman from Wisconsin but by many others who have spoken in opposition to this bill, that we propose to place this power in the hands of nine commissioners who may be controlled improperly. Mr. Speaker, we have a Supreme Court consisting of but nine judges. They are nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate just in the manner proposed by this bill. In the hands of those nine judges are placed all the interests of this great country that can ever come for judgment before the highest court of this nation. Yet, sir, who ever heard any one question the integrity of those nine judges? Can there not be appointed under this bill nine men who can be trusted, who will be competent to regulate the tariff of rates for the transportation of passengers and freight? In any event the subject is always under the control of Congress, and if this mode is found not to work well Congress can easily change it and substitute another and a better.

Many gentlemen say that this question is not susceptible of regulation by legislative authority. Mr. Speaker, the men who control these railroads have no trouble in regulating this matter. Five of them can any day get together in New York and regulate the commerce of this great country in all its parts. Only five of them, I believe, gathered there early in December last, and declared that 33⅓ per cent. should be added to the tariff of rates from all the Northwest; and the people from my State and district, from Iowa and from all the northwestern country, must pay this additional charge. It did not take these railroad managers many days to do that. It does not take a convention of ticket agents or freight agents a great while, when they get together, to agree what the rate shall be for transportation of freight and passengers. Do gentlemen tell us that the nine men who may constitute this commission, under the law, cannot regulate the rates of railroad travel and transportation? Is the matter so intricate that no man is competent to regulate it unless he is personally interested in it? Is it so intricate that it cannot be regulated except by the men who stand at the head of these great railroads? They regulate it at present absolutely. They have laid an iron hand upon the commerce of this country; they have amassed from the labor and the industry of the nation great fortunes. They have imposed upon the commerce of the country burdens which the people now declare they cannot and will not longer bear. I believe, sir, the time has come when it is the duty of Congress to lay its hand upon these great corporations—not to crush them, not to destroy them, not to injure them in any regard; but to control and regulate them by law, as the Constitution of the United States declares we may do, and as is demanded by the great and growing interests upon which these corporations have laid the hand of power so oppressively. If we refuse to do this we neglect a great duty imposed upon us by the Constitution itself.

Sir, we have now nearly eighty thousand miles of railroad stretching throughout the country, east and west, north and south; and in the future these roads will cover an extent of one million miles. How vast the amount of the interests that will then be involved in this traffic. Forty thousand million dollars would not be too high an estimate for the amount which will be thus invested when we shall have as many railroads in proportion to the area of our country as some of the European countries now have. This is not mere guess-work; it is not only possible, but more than probable, that it will be realized. Shall we now say that this railroad power is so great that we cannot control it, that we will not undertake to exercise any power over it, but will leave it to the several States? For one, I say that it is worse than folly to talk about leaving the interstate commerce to be controlled and managed by the several States. As to the commerce wholly internal in a State, neither I nor any other member of this House, so far as I know or believe, would assume to interfere with it. There is no power lodged here to control such commerce; but in reference to that which is interstate and carried on between the several States of the Union, and that which is carried on between this and foreign countries, we have not only the power to regulate it but it is our duty to regulate it, and that duty we cannot postpone to any future time without neglecting a duty which we owe to the people of this country as their Representatives. The power is ample, the duty to exercise it is plain.

I thank the House for its attention, and if I have any time left I yield it, as I promised, to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WILSON.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has four minutes left, but the gentleman from Indiana is not present.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the gentleman from Indiana is not here, I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question before he sits down.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Very well.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I have been very much interested in the speech of the gentleman from Illinois, and especially in his remarks undertaking to answer the question I put to him, or rather the suggestion I made to him that this would be taking away the power from the States and putting it in the hands of nine commissioners. Has the gentleman considered the extent of the proposition, how much this will remove from the influence and power of the people this great question? Has he considered how little influence the people will be able to exert upon the Federal power which undertakes to regulate commerce, in comparison with their ability and power to influence the State Legislatures? He knows how readily they come into contact with the State Legislatures. He knows how little, on the contrary, the people influence the legislation of Congress. They appear at their State capitals and operate upon the men who control matters there. Here he knows we seldom ever see a farmer or agriculturist under any circumstances.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. If I have any time left, I should like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin whether the States have any power to regulate interstate commerce, and if he thinks that the agriculturists of whom he speaks in each State could throng the Legislatures of all the other States to look out for their commercial interests to advantage?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I believe the States can regulate much more satisfactorily and with much more benefit to the country this question of transportation by railroads through their limits.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The gentleman does not answer my question. Does not the Constitution of the United States prohibit them from exercising any such power as the control over interstate commerce?

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman does not answer my question either. [Laughter.] I wish him to answer that, and then perhaps I will answer him.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin whether he believes the several States have the power to control interstate commerce?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I feel so much interested in the answer which I expect from the gentleman from Illinois to my question that I will not take up his time, but will yield the floor to him for that purpose.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I have already stated in answer to the gentleman, two or three times, that I do not believe that the States have any power to control interstate commerce, but that they had absolute power to control commerce within the limits of the States respectively. Now, does he believe there is any power on the part of the several States to control interstate commerce?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I have been waiting for the gentleman to answer my question.

Mr. MONROE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to express my approval of the purpose and general character of this bill. I will not say that it cannot be improved in some of its details; but that it is as free from defect as any measure of this kind which we are likely to pass, I am fully convinced.

I approve of this bill because it proposes that Congress shall engage in the regulation rather than in the construction of railroads. We might expend $100,000,000 for the construction of a great continental freight railroad connecting the Atlantic and Mississippi, with double track and steel rails, for the purpose of regulating freights by means of competition. It is true that we have not the money in the Treasury, but we could probably raise it if it were thought worth while to do so, by borrowing, or by the imposition of fresh taxes. But we must admit at the outset that such a road would cost us two dollars for every dollar that a well-managed private enterprise would find it necessary to expend. As soon as it should be understood that the Government had $100,000,000 to be expended upon contracts the Treasury would become the prey of a great multitude of adventurers, who would come in throngs from all points of the compass to divide the spoil.

I do not say this because I lack reasonable confidence in high officials here in Washington who should have the general management of such an enterprise. I should hope that, whatever party might be in power, the President, the members of his Cabinet, or other persons of high position here, who might accept so responsible a trust, would endeavor to discharge it honestly and efficiently. But the difficulty would lie deeper than this. It would be found in the very fact of imposing upon Government an amount and kind of work which no Government can properly perform. I do not believe that the Federal Government can successfully engage at the present time in the business of constructing and working roads on its own account. High officers of state would, no doubt, wish that the work should be thoroughly and economically done; but they could not give it their personal supervision nor attend to the expenditure of moneys, and in the end the millions appropriated for the object must be intrusted to an army of subordinates, some of whom would be honest and capable, while others would make it the study of their lives to get the most money for the least service rendered.

But if Congress should succeed in causing such a road as I have described to be built, it would very imperfectly answer the end sought. It would be necessary in the end to build several other roads of like character across the continent, and to construct or buy many branch roads also, in order to distribute competition sufficiently to regulate the freights of the whole country. I dare not vote to assume responsibilities so vast. In the present condition of our finances the inauguration of such a system of expenditure would not be right in itself, nor would it meet with the approval of the people. I deem it, then, a most commendable feature of this bill that it asks us not to build railroads, but to provide that those built, or to be built, by private enterprise shall be managed in a manner useful to all and hurtful to none.

I also approve this bill because it does not lay upon Congress the duty of fixing schedules of rates—a duty which this body is not well fitted to perform—but devolves it upon a commission, specially selected for the purpose. This relieves Congress from a pressure of personal solicitation, which is as annoying as it is unseemly, and which a small body could more readily escape. It is further evident that the regulation of rates must have an elastic character, and, to that end, should be committed to a small number of men who can be engaged in constant supervision of it, and modify it according to the varying conditions of trade.

In the few moments allowed me I shall not discuss further the constitutional power of Congress to regulate the management of railroads which convey our commerce from State to State, for I could not hope to add anything to the able and exhaustive arguments upon that subject to which the House has already listened. Nor can I afford to dwell upon the fact and the magnitude of the evil to be remedied, because this has been abundantly discussed both in and out of Congress, and is generally admitted. But assuming that there is a great evil demanding our attention, and that Congress, under the general grant of power to regulate commerce between the States has power to remove it, the practical question is, does this bill fairly answer the end proposed? Objections have been urged against it, and to some of these I will invite attention.

1. It is said that legislation of this kind is a violation of a well-established principle of political economy which maintains that the management of all branches of ordinary business lies outside of the proper jurisdiction of government; that that government is the best which interferes least with the business of the people; that natural competition and private enterprise are the best regulators of all departments of production and of traffic; that the people are best cared for when they are most let alone; and that the legislative body should be especially careful not to pass laws interfering with the compensation of labor or of any department of business for service rendered.

Now, I readily admit that this principle, with proper limitations, is a sound one. Other things being equal, that government is the best which interferes least with the common business of life. I think that only a great necessity (and such a necessity exists) could justify such an interference as that contemplated by this bill. I am not without sympathy with those who look with solicitude upon the tendency to accumulate powers here at Washington, and to extend the jurisdiction of the Government into new fields. There is danger of loading down the Federal Government with burdens which it was never intended to carry, and under which it might in time be crushed.

But while it is our plain duty to guard against this tendency, we must not be deterred, through fear of centralization, from such legislation as is necessary to protect the interests of the whole people.

Even that simplest theory of Government which limits its duties to the protection of life, liberty, and property, might not only permit but demand such legislation as that which we are now considering.

The proper regulation of railroads has intimate connection with the protection of life and property. There has been no instance in history of any civilized government which would not have interfered—which did not interfere when necessary—with any great business of the country which was conducted in such a manner as to injure the community at large. Numerous examples of this kind might be quoted, but they will readily occur to us all.

Obviously we cannot take the ground, that we will not undertake legislation which interferes with ordinary business. We have done this again and again. Our laws of the past do affect the wages of labor, the prices of all commodities, and the incomes from business. Our system of taxation does this, whether by tariff duties or taxes for internal revenue. The prices of wheat and corn, of silk and broadcloth, are not what they would have been without our interference. The tariff which we impose upon iron and other materials used in railroad construction undoubtedly affects the cost of transportation. We have even enacted that for all laborers in the employment of the Government eight hours of labor shall constitute a day's work. This law not only affects the wages of the class named, but also those of other classes. It is evidently, then, too late, so far as precedents are concerned, to urge against this bill the objection that it interferes with the rewards of labor or business. If legislation is unwholesome and injurious merely because it changes prices, then half the important legislation of our country has been an outrage upon the welfare of the people.

It is worth observing what a change of opinion some men appear to have experienced within a few years upon this subject of interference with business. It is not long since Congress undertook to change the routes of commerce for this continent and for the world by bestowing princely subsidies upon railroad lines penetrating to the Pacific. It is the most marked instance of legislative interference with business in all history. It was an attempt not only to create new routes of commerce, but to injure or destroy old ones. To accomplish this, Congress gave away, in the language of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of this House, "an empire on the north, a zone through the center of the continent, and principalities all through the Territories." Gentlemen seem to have borne this interference well enough. We then heard something said of the duty of Congress to legislate for the advancement of our commerce. But do our duties cease here? Has Congress no powers in regard to these great corporations, except to give them the property of the people, and when the bounty of the people is abused, and their interests suffer in consequence, are they to be told that they have no means of protecting themselves against injury from the organizations which their beneficence has blessed; that the people exist to bestow and to aid, but not to regulate or control or amend; that there is nothing in our civil polity to prevent a bountiful, an imperial munificence toward the railroads of the country, that they may lawfully accept to any extent and still stretch out their hands for more, and that it is only when we propose to hold them accountable for their magnificent privileges and franchises, and to ask that they shall not use these to the destruction of other interests greater even than their own, that sound principles of government are suddenly discovered to be in the way of further interference?

2. But, again, it is urged that the commission provided for in this bill is objectionable. It is said that the number of the commissioners is not the proper one. I hear the word "nine" pronounced in a tone of criticism, as if no commission could prosper that should consist of that number. But if the number is objectionable, for what reason? Is it too large or too small? It can hardly be considered too large to represent properly the immense and varied interests of different sections. It is perhaps large enough to work together with harmony and efficiency. The commission would not be quite so large as one of the standing committees of this House which I think has generally been found quite large enough to dispatch business promptly and without the delay of protracted debate. The number of the commissioners would at least be as great as the number of men who, as is commonly believed, have exerted a dominating influence over the vast railroad interests of the country. The four men at the head of the New York Central, the Erie, the Pennsylvania Central, and the Baltimore and Ohio roads are understood to have had the railroad interests of the nation very largely under their control. If four men have been found to be enough to manage our railroads in the interest of private ambition, nine would, perhaps, be able to do it in the interest of the people.

But it is further objected that these men will not be such in character, ability, and knowledge of affairs as to be fitted for so responsible a trust. I reply, that they are to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The high character of these official personages is believed to afford a strong guarantee that the selections made will be suitable. If it be said that this method of filling offices has not always been found a sufficient protection against incapacity or dishonesty, I can only say that all human modes of choosing officers are imperfect and liable to failure, and that this one is at least the highest, the most dignified, and the most carefully guarded of any known to our laws. It has been thought a suitable method for making appointments to the supreme bench of this nation and for choosing envoys extraordinary to the great powers of the world, and we may, perhaps, employ it without offense for selecting a railroad commission, at least until some better way of accomplishing the object shall have been pointed out to us. I may be unfashionable; but I must still contend that I can find no better guarantee for the protection of my interests, as one of the people, in filling offices of this kind than the judgment of the President of the United States as corrected and supplemented by the Senate. It may be added that this subject of the relations of our railroads to other interests has been so generally discussed, and such a deep interest is felt in it by the whole people, that this of itself would furnish sufficient motive, if motive were wanting, to the most careful consideration in the choice of officials toward whom the eyes of the whole nation will be turned.

But an objection of graver character sometimes offered upon this floor, and frequently repeated in the press since this subject has been under discussion, could, I think, have originated only in the want of a careful examination of the bill. It is said that this measure places the vast railroad interests of the country wholly under the control of the nine commissioners. If this were true it would be a fatal objection. I would not vote for such a bill, and certainly this House would not pass it. But the criticism is unfounded. What are the powers of the commissioners under this bill? They are authorized to take testimony and to collect all the information necessary to prepare for the railroads schedules of freights, which shall be reasonable and free from unjust discrimination, and to keep these schedules posted in the offices and depots of the roads for which they are designed. Should the officers of these roads disregard these schedules, the commissioners may then cause suit to be brought against them in any district or circuit court of the United States, for demanding and collecting unreasonable rates. Here the power of the commission ceases. The interests of both the railroad and the citizen are now in the keeping of a United States court, a tribunal which may be expected to be just and impartial, so long as just and impartial tribunals are found in the land. Before this court the schedules constitute only one portion of the evidence to be received and considered. The bill expressly provides that the railroad shall have opportunity to show the superior reasonableness of its rates of toll over those provided by the schedules, and if it can succeed in doing this it is acquitted of all blame. Can any one believe that these roads, with their immense resources, and with the best talent of the nation at their command, would not have an equal chance for a fair hearing in a contest of this kind with the citizens of the country. This commission has been spoken of by some as if it were itself a court for the trial of causes. But there is not a word of this in the bill. The commissioners have no power to impose a fine of one dollar, or penalty of any other kind, upon any railroad for the most flagrant misconduct. Indeed, where railroads have collected unreasonable rates or practiced unjust discriminations, the notice given them beforehand by the commissioners is a positive kindness, as it enables them by timely compliance to escape prosecution. If they have done no wrong, and the schedules furnished them are unreasonable, they may then go into court with quite as much hope of having their cause vindicated as any other innocent party.

So much for the objection that the powers intrusted to this commission are too great; but my esteemed colleague [Mr. WOODWORTH] urges an objection of precisely the opposite kind. He contends that the powers of the commissioners are too small, and regards the bill for that reason as being weak, vague, and ineffective. I might leave the gentlemen who press these conflicting objections to argue the question with each other, but may I not suggest to the House that a measure which is attacked from opposite extremes for such conflicting reasons may itself occupy the happy medium of moderation and of safety? And will it not occur to my colleague, who I know desires as much as I do to pass some law of this kind, that it is not worth while to enlarge the powers of this commission when the limited authority already granted them is made a principal objection to the passage of the bill?

3. It is further said that this bill will be sure to have some unwise provisions in it; that this is a most delicate and difficult subject for legislation; that the field is new, and that any attempt to occupy it is an experiment, and that we shall certainly find that any legislation which we may devise will work badly in ways that we do not now anticipate.

There is, no doubt, some truth in all this. Very likely we shall fall into some error; but, fortunately, when experience has shown what it is, it can soon be amended. All valuable legislation, especially in new directions, is largely experimental. Much of human life, in spite of all that history teaches, is still an experiment. But we are not to be deterred by this from the effort at improvement. We are not to leave the people of the country to suffer under great evils because we may happen to make some mistake in trying to help them. If legislation must be delayed by objections like this, all reform, all progress, must cease. The nation that will risk nothing will have nothing. We are not the men for a great crisis or a great time if we cannot take some responsibility. We learn from history that great reforms by Government have generally begun in honest and well-considered, but imperfect, legislation. This has been gradually improved as time has disclosed its defects, until finally the desired result has been achieved. We must be content to work by like means. Let us pass the best bill that we can agree upon, trusting to a future Congress to make such amendments as experience shall suggest. If we do this, I believe that we shall accomplish a great and permanent good. I am fully of the faith that whatever the welfare of the American people really demands there will ultimately be found a way to accomplish.

I am not without a proper appreciation of the great value of railroads to our country. National prosperity is now impossible without them. To destroy them would be to put us back a hundred years in the march of civilization. To attempt to injure them or to cripple their efficiency is madness. Such an attempt, if successful, would aggravate beyond endurance all the evils of which other interests in the country now complain. But while all this is strictly true, it is equally true that the more valuable the railroad interest is to us the more important it is that it should be wisely managed. Whatever else we may permit to go wrong, we cannot allow this branch of business to be perverted from its legitimate ends. Let us enact some fair, honest, and well-considered law, and time will demonstrate that it was done not less in the real interest of the railroads themselves than in the interest of other portions of the community.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I wish to give notice that if the previous question shall not be seconded on this bill I will, if I have the opportunity, offer the following substitute for the bill:

Be it enacted, &c., That no railroad company shall make any discrimination in its rate of charges between persons doing business with such company for the transportation of a like amount of freight, of like class, for a like distance, over the line or connecting lines of railroad owned or operated by it, when such freight is being transported from one State to another, or to or from any foreign nation.

SEC. 2. That any railroad company owning or operating a line or connecting lines of railroad crossing a State line, or engaged in the business of transporting freight from one State to another, or to or from any foreign nation, shall establish and fix, and post up in some conspicuous place in each of its depots and stations, and keep constantly so posted, a classification of freights and its rates of charges a mile for the transportation of freight being transported from one State to another, or to or from any foreign nation, of each class, by the hundred-weight, by the ton, by the car-load, or by any specified number of car-loads, for every distance. The rates of freight so fixed and published shall be the lawful rates such railroad company shall charge in every case, except for Government freights and mails, and except for freight transported for purposes of charity, so long as such schedules of rates remain unchanged, and for thirty days thereafter. Every such railroad company shall also prepare and post, and keep constantly posted, in some conspicuous place in each of its depots and stations, a table showing the distance from each of its terminal depots to each of its stations in any other State on its entire line of road.

SEC. 3. That every railroad company violating any provision of this act shall, for every such violation, forfeit to the United States the sum of not less than $5,000, nor more than $50,000, at the discretion of the court, which shall be collected in the district court of the United States for the district where such violation may occur; and it shall be the duty of the district attorney for such district to prosecute the same to final judgment by action in the name of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the words "railroad company," as used in this act, shall be held to mean any corporation, company, combination of companies, person or persons engaged in transporting freight for hire from one State to another, or to or from any foreign nation, or on its way from one State to another, on any line or connecting lines of railroad. Nothing in this act shall be held to impair the right of any person to recover damages from any railroad company for any violation of the provisions of this act, or for any unlawful, unjust, or exorbitant charges for the transportation of any freight.

SEC. 5. This act shall take effect thirty days after its passage.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be understood as being opposed to the bill of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY.] I will, if I can, get this House to pass something more in accordance with my own views; but if I cannot secure the adoption of my own bill, I will vote for that of the gentleman from Iowa. There are, however, in my judgment, some very serious objections to that bill.

In the first place, it recognizes and proposes to continue in existence the great fundamental evil of railroad management in this country—the principle of maximum rates. I assert, sir, that no just law can be passed either by a State Legislature or by Congress that recognizes this principle. A railroad is a public highway, and the people of the country have the right to its free and equal use. There can be no such thing as free and equal use of a highway on which one man is taxed more than another for the same service. This bill recognizes that principle of maximum rates. But, sir, we can never have any good law on the subject until we discard entirely the idea that different persons shall be charged different rates for similar service. Under the provisions of the bill I propose there is to be no discrimination between different persons for the same service. This must be the fundamental principle of any just law upon this question. It is impossible to have a good law until this principle is established and planted in the very foundation of the law.

There is another objection to this bill. It establishes what will become at no distant day a great bureau, which, within five years, will be a power in this country almost equal to one of the Executive Departments of the Government. This bill requires—

That said board of railroad commissioners shall institute a thorough investigation and inquiry into the rates of toll and compensation charged for transporting freights and passengers over each of such lines of railroad as are herein described and designated, and into the reasonableness thereof.

Now, to propose that nine men shall undertake to fix the reasonable rates of toll on more that seventy thousand miles of railroad is to propose what is impracticable. Is it not probable that this board of railroad commissioners will become the tools of the railroad companies? Why, sir, it is a great problem, as any railroad man will tell you, to fix the reasonable rates of toll on a single line of railroad; but here it is proposed to require that one man—for I presume that these commissioners will divide into sub-committees—shall undertake to thoroughly investigate and establish the rates of toll on eight thousand miles of railroad, which are rapidly increasing in extent. It is impossible. All that one man can do is to take the dictum of the railroad companies as to what is right and reasonable. I think that this will be found to be the effect of that provision of the bill. I greatly fear that this board will become the tool of the railroad companies.

Another objection to this bill is this: It does not in any manner attempt to regulate that part of the commerce of the country with foreign nations which is transported over our railroads. A very large part of the freight over our railroads is destined for foreign countries without passing across a State line. Under the Constitution we have as much power to regulate that business as we have to regulate that which is merely among the States. And I know of no good reason why freight going from Ohio, New York, or Michigan into Canada does not require the protection of the law as much as that which merely passes from one State to another.

The bill which I have proposed to the House provides for the regulation of rates of freight on its way to or from foreign countries over our railroads.

Notwithstanding these very grave objections to the bill under consideration, if I cannot procure the substitution of a better bill, I shall vote for it.

I concur most fully in all that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] has said about the necessity of regulating railroads by law. The power these great corporations have to oppress is fearful. No language can exaggerate it. Whole communities can be taxed without reason or justice by railroad management. Individuals may be sorely oppressed. This bill, bad as some of its provisions are, has in it some desirable things. Besides, it is at least an assertion of the power of Congress over the subject. If it should be found in its operation—as I think it will—to be defective, it can, when time and experience point out those defects, be amended. There is much more I would like to say, but my time has expired.

Mr. MCCRARY. As I have promised to give to other gentlemen the entire hour to which I shall be entitled after the previous question shall be ordered, I would like the indulgence of the House for about five minutes before making the motion for the previous question.

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. MCCRARY. Every provision of this bill, Mr. Speaker, has been carefully considered; and I wish to utter a word of warning here in regard to any proposition that may be presented which has not been carefully considered by a committee. If there is any subject upon which the House ought not to act hastily, it is this. The Committee on Railways and Canals have not undertaken to lay down in this bill an iron rule, because all experience shows that any such legislation would be worse than futile. The proposition of the bill of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH] is not a new one. It has been tried in the State of Illinois and has failed utterly. There are a thousand circumstances that enter into the fixing of rates to be charged by railroad companies, and you cannot in an act of this sort lay down an iron rule which will apply to every road and under all circumstances. Hence it is that all authorities on this subject admit that the only regulation which is possible is in the nature of an executive regulation with power to make rules, and to change them if necessary to meet the changing circumstances which will occur from time to time. The Massachusetts commissioners said in their last report, made but a few days ago, that no law can be framed sufficiently flexible to provide in advance for all the requirements of a system so complex as that of modern transportation by rail. Some play of discretion for individual requirements is absolutely necessary; and this is the principle upon which this bill has been framed. I have no doubt this commission will very soon reach and establish certain general rules, certain great principles upon which they will base their action; but to apply the same rules under all circumstances is utterly impossible.

I repeat that after the previous question is ordered (if it should be ordered) I expect to yield my hour to other gentlemen, and not to say anything further myself.

I observe an error in the printed bill which I wish to correct by an amendment. I move to insert before the word "person," in the twelfth line of the second section, the words "company, corporation;" so that the clause will read as follows:

And for each and every violation of this act, by charging, collecting, demanding, or receiving more than such reasonable rate, the company, corporation, person or persons so offending shall be jointly and severally liable for extortion, as hereinafter provided.

I now withdraw the motion to recommit, and call the previous question on the bill and amendments as reported by the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, if the House should vote down the previous question the bill will, I believe, be open for amendment.

The SPEAKER. Should the House decline to second the demand for the previous question, the bill would then be open to amendment. It is now at the amendable stage.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the House will give a fair chance for amendments.

The SPEAKER. If the House should refuse to second the demand for the previous question, gentlemen who wish to offer amendments will be recognized.

The Chair will direct the vote on the previous question to be taken by tellers; and will appoint the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. MCCRARY, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN.

Mr. MCCRARY. I desire the vote on the previous question may test the sense of the House on the bill as reported from the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish it to be open to amendment, so that it may be made less objectionable than it is.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I do not agree to the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] that this is a test vote.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 100, noes 49.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question recurred on ordering the main question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 75, noes 61.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MCCRARY and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 104, noes 53.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I demand the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the House does not order the main question will not the bill still be open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. Of course the seconding of the previous question goes for nothing if the main question is not ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to strike out the clause creating a bureau, and all the features of the bill creating new and unnecessary offices.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I object to debate.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 128, nays 95, not voting 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Barrere, Barry, Begole, Bell, Bowen, Bradley, Bundy, Burchard, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Cason, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Thomas, Townsend, Waddell, Jasper D. Ward, White, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, Wilshire, Wolfe, Wood, and Woodford—66.

So the main question was ordered to be put.

During the vote

Mr. MAYNARD said: Mr. Speaker, I have received a note from the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. COBB, saying that in consequence of the illness of a member of his family he is detained from the sitting to-day, and desiring me to say so to the House. I desire further to say that on the bill under consideration I am paired with the gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr. PENDLETON, and I shall consider that pair as extending to all incidental questions.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to say that I am paired with the gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. WILSHIRE, who is in favor of the bill, while I am against it.

Mr. PELHAM. I desire to state, Mr. Speaker, that my colleague, Mr. WHITE, is still detained at his room by illness; if present he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. POLAND. My colleague, Mr. HENDEE, who is necessarily absent, has given me no distinct authority as to how he would vote; but I judge that he would vote in the affirmative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. McCRARY. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. NIBLACK. Is it in order to lay the bill upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. NIBLACK. Then I make that motion.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Does that deprive the chairman of the Committee on Railways and Canals of his right to close the debate?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Iowa takes the floor, the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. McCRARY. I think it unnecessary to take an additional vote on that question.

Mr. SPEER. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. McCRARY. Not now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will regard the motion of the gentleman from Indiana as pending.

Mr. KASSON. Will my colleague allow me to ask this question, whether as manager of this bill he is not willing to have it brought to a final vote to-night?

Mr. McCRARY. I am quite willing to do so, except for the reason I have agreed to yield to other gentlemen, as I have already stated, and unless there is a strongly expressed desire to have the vote to-night I shall feel bound to carry out that arrangement. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. KASSON. I think we ought to take a final vote to-night, so that we may go to the other public business which is pressing. If the gentleman will yield to me I will make a motion to test the sense of the House on that question.

Mr. McCRARY. If the House desires to vote to-night, I shall not insist on my right to the closing hour.

The SPEAKER. That can be tested on a motion for adjournment. If the House shall negative the motion to adjourn, it will be understood that the House desires to come to an immediate vote. If the House shall vote to adjourn, that will throw it over till to-morrow.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 86, noes 113.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair accepts this vote as an indication of the desire of the House to come to a vote on the bill. The first question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK,] which is that the bill do lie upon the table.

Mr. SPEER. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The question was taken on the motion to lay the bill on the table; and there were—yeas 92, nays 128, not voting 70; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barber, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Buckner, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Crooke, Crossland, DeWitt, Durham, Eames, Eldredge, Giddings, Glover, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Joseph R. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Albright, Archer, Bass, Brown, Burleigh, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Thomas, Christopher Y. Thomas, Waddell, Jasper D. Ward, White, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, Wilshire, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, and Woodford—70.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

During the roll-call, the following announcements were made:

Mr. VANCE. I am requested by my colleague, Mr. LEACH, to state that he is detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. SOUTHARD. My colleague, Mr. JEWETT, is necessarily absent in a committee-room, along with Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. They are paired. If here Mr. JEWETT would vote "ay," and Mr. WILSON "no."

Mr. HOSKINS. My colleague, Mr. BASS, is absent, by order of the House, on the District investigation committee.

Mr. RICE. Mr. STANARD, of Missouri, is absent from the House. I am paired with him. If he were here he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. CONGER. My colleague, Mr. HUBBELL, is absent on the District investigating committee, by leave of the House. If present he would vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on concurring in the amendments of the committee. The Clerk will report them.

Mr. SENER. I ask permission to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an amendment which I would have offered at the proper time if I could have got the floor. I struggled in vain all day to get the permission from the gentleman who has charge of the bill.

There was no objection. The proposed amendment was as follows:

Add to the bill the following as an additional section:

SEC. 15. That all the provisions of this act shall be applicable to and be deemed to embrace not only each and every line of railroad extending into or through two or more States, and employed in carrying freight or passengers between points or places in different States, but every company, corporation, or person owning any vessel or boat propelled in whole or in part by steam which may now or hereafter be employed in carrying freight or passengers between points or places in different States.

Mr. McCRARY. The amendments of the committee in the body of the bill are merely verbal, and I presume will be concurred in without a formal vote.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection those amendments will be regarded as concurred in. The Clerk will report the last amendment reported by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as an additional section to the bill the following:

SEC. 15. That all unjust discrimination in the matter of charges for carrying freight or passengers over or upon any such line of railroad as is herein described is hereby prohibited; and any corporation, company, or person engaged in operating any such line of railroad who shall be guilty of any such unjust discrimination in making or collecting such charges, in favor of or against any person, firm, or company, or in favor of or against any particular place on the line or at a terminus of such road, shall be subject to the same penalty as that provided in cases of extortion under this act; and such penalty shall be enforced in the same manner as in such cases of extortion; and the party injured by any such unjust discrimination shall have his action for damages in the same manner as in cases of extortion.

Mr. SPEER. How does that amendment come before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is reported by the committee.

Mr. SPEER. Since the previous question was seconded?

The SPEAKER. When the committee reported back the bill they reported this as an amendment.

Mr. SPEER. It is not printed with the bill.

The SPEAKER. Yes; the Clerk has read the amendment from the printed copy.

Mr. SPEER. It is not printed in the bill which is on the files of members.

The SPEAKER. What is the printer's number of the bill which is on the gentleman's file?

Mr. SPEER. It is printer's number 1316; and the amendment is not in this copy of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The copy of the bill from which the Clerk read is printer's number 2181.

Mr. McCRARY. The bill was printed and referred to the committee; and when the committee reported it back it reported it with this amendment; and as printed with the amendment it has been on the files for a month.

The SPEAKER. The bill in the shape in which the Clerk read it, with the amendment, was ordered to be printed on the 26th day of February.

The question being taken on the amendment of the committee, it was agreed to.

The question was on ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Iowa will now allow a motion to strike out the bureau provided for in the Interior Department in the last section but one of the bill.

Mr. McCRARY. I must decline to admit any amendments now.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. McCRARY. I call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. NIBLACK. I ask for the reading of the engrossed bill.

Mr. McCRARY. If the gentleman from Indiana insists upon the reading of the engrossed bill I shall agree to the motion for adjournment.

The SPEAKER. Pending the reading of the engrossed bill the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] demands that the engrossed bill shall be read at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] has a motion pending to that effect.

Mr. DONNAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn, so as to give time for the engrossment of the bill.

Several MEMBERS. O, no; the bill cannot be engrossed.

Mr. DONNAN. Satisfied that the bill is too long to be engrossed during the call of the roll, I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on Mr. ELDREDGE's motion, and it was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 26, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before calling for petitions and memorials, the Chair will call attention to Rule 24, which provides that—

> Every petition or memorial, or other paper, shall be referred, of course, without putting a question for that purpose, unless the reference is objected to by a Senator at the time such petition, memorial, or other paper is presented. And before any petition or memorial, addressed to the Senate, shall be received and read at the table, whether the same shall be introduced by the Presiding Officer, or a Senator, a brief statement of the contents of the petition or memorial shall verbally be made by the introducer.

The habit that has grown up in the Senate of introducing petitions accompanied with remarks and reading the names of the subscribers to the petition, &c., and indulging in more or less debate upon it, is undoubtedly out of order; and the attention of the Chair having been called to it yesterday morning, the Chair will understand that it is the will of the Senate that that debate shall be ruled out of order and excluded, and the Chair will watch it until the further order of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, praying Congress to make such appropriation as may be necessary for completing the improvement of the navigation of the Saginaw River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the memorial of Henry A. Griffin and 451 others, citizens of Wyandotte, Michigan, praying for an increase of the volume of the currency adequate to the demands of the business community, and stating that the great West is alike suffering from such want, while all commercial communities require a medium of circulation to enable commerce to flourish; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented the petition of Fitzhugh Lee, of Richland, Stafford County, Virginia, and the petition of Charles M. Fauntleroy, of Virginia, praying the removal of their political disabilities; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KELLY presented resolutions of a mass meeting held in the city of Portland, Oregon, asking Congress to aid in the construction of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad; which were referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Baker County, Oregon, praying the passage of the bill granting aid to the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. LOGAN presented a memorial of hat-dealers of Chicago, protesting against any further extension of the Wells patent for forming hat-bodies; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented a petition of one-armed pensioners of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, praying for a change in the pension laws; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to present also the petition of a number of business men of New York—the letter accompanying the petition says 300, but I have not counted the number of names—praying for an increase of the currency and free banking. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I also ask leave to say, if it is not in violation of the rule, inasmuch as some criticism has been made in reference to petitions presented by Senators not representing New York, that I have taken the pains to have a list made——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the remarks are out of order.

Mr. LOGAN. Would it be in order to read a letter accompanying the list?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would not. The Chair will enforce the rule until the Senate express their opinion to the contrary.

Mr. LOGAN. Would it be in order, then, to ask that this memorandum be referred to the Committee on Finance?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can ask that, certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state what the memorandum is.

Mr. MORTON. You can read it after the morning hour is over.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; I will withhold it until then.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the petition of P. Cudmore and 122 others, praying Congress to give to each volunteer Union soldier a land warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of land, and $300 additional bounty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of an appropriation to aid in the improvement of the navigation of the Saginaw River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. OGLESBY presented the petition of J. S. Kellogg, of Illinois, praying that an increase of pension be granted to John W. January; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Rock Island, Illinois, praying the passage of Mr. COTTON'S bill in relation to the Rock Island bridge; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented the memorial of citizens of Rock Island, Illinois, opposing the proposed change of location of the military prison from Rock Island to Fort Leavenworth; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORTON. I present the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Evansville, Indiana, setting forth that under the second section of the act of Congress approved December 17, 1872, all bridges over the Ohio River below the Covington and Cincinnati suspension bridge shall have, in addition to the high span, a pivot-draw, giving two clear openings of one hundred and sixty feet each. They represent that this makes a bridge across the Ohio River so expensive that it can hardly be built, and they ask for a change in the law so that it shall be sufficient either to construct a span four hundred feet in width, or a pivot-draw of one hundred and sixty feet on each side in the clear. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. RAMSEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the petition of Valentine Steiner, postmaster at Knightstown, Indiana, praying to be relieved from liability for postage-stamps destroyed by fire on the night of the 17th of September, 1873, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, inasmuch as the law already confers upon the Postmaster-General authority to make compensation to postmasters for losses of stamps by fire.

The committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. RAMSEY. I suggest that the papers be returned to the Post-Office Department, from which they seem to have come.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2086) for the relief of R. W. Clarke, postmaster at Brattleborough, Vermont, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I am directed by the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 555) for the relief of McClintock Young, of the State of Maryland, to report it back without amendment and with a written report, and to ask for its present consideration.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WRIGHT. I know nothing about the particulars of this bill, but I propose to insist that we shall come to the Calendar, and therefore I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa objects, and the bill will be laid over.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I ask that the report be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. JOHNSTON, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was recommitted the petition of Rudolf Eickemeyer, praying that the Commissioner of Patents be authorized to proceed with his application for an extension of a sewing-machine patent as if filed under section 63 of the patent law of 1870, reported adversely thereon; and the report was adopted.

He also, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Osceola C. Green, administrator de bonis non and one of the heirs of Lieutenant-Colonel Uriah Forest, deceased, asking such legislation as will authorize payment to the estate of the decedent of the amount of half-pay allowed by law for services rendered by him in the war of the Revolution, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 629) for the relief of Osceola C. Green, administrator de bonis non and one of the heirs at law of Lieutenant-Colonel Uriah Forest.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred several petitions of members of the class of 1869 of the United States Naval Academy, praying that an act be passed allowing them to take rank and precedence as determined by the date of their graduation, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1201) authorizing the payment of prize-money to the officers and crew of the United States steamer Bienville, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 83) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to remove the powder-magazine from Fort Norfolk, Norfolk, Virginia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. OGLESBY. The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom were referred the bill (H. R. No. 1758) authorizing the purchase of six hundred and forty acres of land for a Nez Percé Indian reservation in the Territory of Idaho, and the bill (S. No. 107) to purchase six hundred and forty acres of land in the Territory of Idaho for the Nez Percé Indian reservation, have had the subject under consideration, and instructed me to report back both bills, with a new bill in the nature of a substitute for both.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the two bills, House bill No. 1758 and Senate bill No. 107, will be postponed indefinitely, and the bill now reported will have its first reading.

The bill (S. No. 630) to authorize the purchase of six hundred and forty acres of land in the Territory of Idaho for the Nez Percé Indian reservation was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2547) to relieve from political disabilities Thomas Hardeman, jr., reported it adversely, and moved its indefinite postponement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. NORWOOD. I object to its indefinite postponement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the bill will go on the Calendar.

Mr. WRIGHT. That was my desire.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 631) to facilitate and reduce the expenses of taking testimony in behalf of claimants to be used before the commissioners of claims; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 632) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 633) for the relief of A. H. Von Luettwitz, late lieutenant in Third United States Cavalry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 634) concerning and authorizing the Washington, Cincinnati and Saint Louis Railroad Company to extend and construct their railroad into the District of Columbia, and through the States of West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois to the city of Saint Louis, in the State of Missouri, and a branch road from any point they may elect on the main line of their road, in the State of Indiana, to the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, and granting aid to such company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board.

CORPORATIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. DENNIS. I desire to submit an amendment which I shall offer to the bill (H. R. No. 2423) explanatory of an act entitled "An act to provide for the creation of corporations in the District of Columbia by general law," now before the Committee on the District of Columbia. The amendment is in the nature of an additional section. I move that it be printed, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

PRACTICE IN TERRITORIAL COURTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The other morning we had up a bill which the Supreme Court is desirous should pass, and I should like to have it disposed of now. I propose to accept the amendment which was offered to it by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. STEVENSON,] and I suppose it will only be necessary then to take the vote upon it. I have conferred with the Senator from Kentucky, and also with the Senator from Ohio who opposed the bill, in regard to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him which was under debate in the morning hour the day before yesterday.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall not object if it does not lead to debate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It will lead to no debate.

Mr. SARGENT. I think I must object. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] is not here, and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] is not here.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have conferred with both of them, and it is agreeable to them.

Mr. SARGENT. Then I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to taking up the bill indicated by the Senator from New Jersey? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WEST. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2451.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is out of order, there being another bill before the Senate at the present time, unless the Senator makes a motion to postpone.

Mr. WEST. The Calendar is before the Senate, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey has called up a bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is only to be voted upon.

Mr. WEST. I understood the Senator to withdraw that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1762) concerning the practice in territorial courts and appeals therefrom, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. STEVENSON to add to the bill the following:

And that this act shall not apply to cases now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States where the record has already been filed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not mean to debate this bill, or to delay its passage for a moment. I wish, however, to make a remark. It belongs to a class of bills for which I have no relish; and I excuse myself for not opposing it upon the ground that it does not relate, as I understand it, to vested rights, in any technical, or exact, or legal sense, but that it does go to the remedy, and stops with that. Even then, I have doubt about it; but with this remark, I shall not feel called upon to make any opposition.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MOUTH OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. WEST. I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2451) to improve the mouth of the Mississippi River.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana moves to postpone the Calendar and proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not propose to object to the consideration of this bill; but it is one of that class of bills upon which there ought to be a word said. It proposes to appropriate $30,000 for a deficiency in the fund for improving the mouth of the Mississippi River. There was $125,000 appropriated for this object last year. Captain Howell, who has charge of the work at the mouth of the Mississippi River, it appears, has expended the $125,000, and comes to Congress and asks for $30,000 more to be expended within the present fiscal year. It has occurred to me that it is about time that Captain Howell and the other captains, colonels, and generals in the service, should keep within the appropriations made by Congress. I am told that he asks this on account of a blockade that occurred at the mouth of the Mississippi some time during last summer. That blockade lasted perhaps two or three weeks, and yet in his statement he charges for extra dredge-boats for about four months, making the excuse of two or three weeks' blockade for four months' charge against the General Government.

Last year I think the deficiencies were between nine and ten million dollars. I hope this year they will not be anything like that, and I think it our duty at once to commence looking at that fact and seeing that such bills do not pass unless they have good foundation. I should like to know from the Senator from Louisiana why it is that Captain Howell comes here and asks for $30,000 this year when he knew just what he had, and ought to have kept within the appropriation.

Mr. WEST. I am glad that the Senator has afforded me an opportunity to explain to the Senate the necessity for this appropriation. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872, we appropriated $155,000 for this work. Last year in an effort at economy we made it $125,000, being just the amount that would be required without any contingency at all. A contingency has arisen. That contingency was that the bar at the mouth of the Mississippi River was blockaded for a certain time, as the Senator says, some three weeks, and yet there are four months' services of the boats required to be paid for against three weeks' blockade. Let me say to the Senator, and I have no doubt he knows it himself, that one week's blockade of the mouth of the Mississippi River might necessitate four months' work on the part of the dredge-boats. The bar was blockaded there, and the impediments accumulated to that extent that it required four months' operations of the dredge-boats to clear them out. The report of the chief engineer calls attention to the fact and states that the appropriation has proved insufficient for the work, owing to the blockade of last March making necessary the working of two dredges instead of one, for nearly four months.

This is not a deficiency under an estimate. This is a deficiency arising from the fact that an accidental cause has rendered the expenditure necessary, just as there was an occasion quite recently here in the instance of the harbor of Buffalo, where a gale of wind so obstructed that harbor by banking up a sand bank as to make it necessary to spend $20,000. Here is an accidental circumstance—a blockade of the mouth of the Mississippi River—that renders additional expenditures necessary. As the matter stands now, without the passage of this bill, we have the mouth of the Mississippi River closed up. I trust the Senate will see the propriety of acceding to the requirement.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no doubt there is a necessity for the passage of the present bill, having some knowledge of the state of things there; but there is as great a necessity that the persons in charge of Government works should keep within the appropriations. I see no good cause, and the Senator has stated none, why there should be $30,000 additional expenditure on this work this year. There were perhaps two weeks of a blockade there, and that blockade has caused a demand on the Treasury for four months' work of an extra dredge-boat.

It is said here that this money is to come out of the appropriation for next year. I think the Committee on Commerce when they reported it made that statement. It may be true that that is the intention now; but when the regular bill for next year comes up the full amount needed for that year will be appropriated, so that this $30,000 is really added to it. This is practically an addition of $30,000, when the expenditure ought to have been kept within the bounds of the appropriation.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, in view of the great importance of this appropriation I beg the indulgence of the Senate for a moment or two.

The work at the mouth of the Mississippi River is of the very greatest importance. It is possible that the system now being carried on may not be the system which will ultimately effect the opening of the mouth of that river, but it has done a great deal of good and is constantly doing good now. Without that work being carried on, the sand and alluvial matter will accumulate so rapidly in the course of a few weeks as to render the ascent of large vessels an impossibility on any of the various outlets of the Mississippi River.

This subject has been investigated by the Committee on Commerce, and I understand the bill has received the unanimous approbation of that committee. It is of such importance, and the amount is so small, that it does seem that we should not lose a moment in making the appropriation. It may be true that the officers of the Government who have charge of this work have exceeded the appropriation of last year, but it is also true that last year the appropriation was $30,000 less than it was the year before. Of course, there are contingencies and accidents and delays, and the repairing of boats, and the building of machinery, and many other such things, that involve an enterprise of this kind in a great many unexpected expenses which cannot be anticipated.

We of the West have heard a great deal about the importance of the navigation of the Mississippi River; and yet here on a small appropriation of $30,000 there appears to be hesitation. The Senator from West Virginia ought to be considered a western man. Although he is high up on the Ohio River, nevertheless the Mississippi is the outlet for his portion of the country; and it seems to me it comes with a strange grace from him to throw any obstacle in the way of this very small appropriation.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me, I will remind him that I made no objection to the bill; on the contrary, I said that no doubt there was a necessity for its passage; I merely called the attention of the Senate and of the parties in charge to the fact that they ought not to exceed the appropriations.

Mr. BOGY. That kind of argument does hurt such a measure as this very much. Now I will not detain the Senate in arguing a matter of this kind. It must be very plain to the mind of the Senate. A small appropriation of this character, in view of the great and paramount object which is effected by the appropriation, I cannot think the Senate will hesitate a single instant in granting, especially when the bill comes here sanctioned by the unanimous report of the proper committee.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. WRIGHT. I call the attention of the Senators from Georgia to a report that I am about to make. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 133) to relieve Thomas Hardeman, jr., of Georgia, and W. L. Cabell, of Texas, of their political disabilities, have had the same under consideration, and a majority of the committee have instructed me to report the same back and recommend its indefinite postponement. I make the report at this time, and the Senator from Georgia can explain the circumstances of the case and what action he may ask of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I object to any consideration of it at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go on the Calendar with the adverse report.

Mr. GORDON. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to say one word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Georgia being heard?

Mr. GORDON. Only a word.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If it takes any time I shall object.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust the Senator from Maine will allow the explanation to be made. I think it is due to the Senator from Georgia under the circumstances.

Mr. GORDON. I only want to make an explanation.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I promised yesterday that I would pay more attention to the rules. If my honorable friend from Iowa had presented his report at the proper time——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine is out of order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The whole thing is out of order, I conceive.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the explanation of the Senator from Georgia? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GORDON. I simply wanted to say that this bill was introduced by me to remove the disabilities of Mr. Cabell, of Texas, who was educated at West Point. He became a brigadier-general in the southern army. The bill was passed by the Senate; and by an understanding between the chairman of the committee, who is now absent, the Senator from Vermont, and myself, I made the motion to refer it, on the motion to reconsider, to the Committee on the Judiciary, in order that the chairman of that committee might get the facts as to his resignation and the acceptance of that resignation by President Lincoln. I furnished the chairman with that information; and upon the agreement that he would see the bill reported immediately back to the Senate I telegraphed to this gentleman to accept a nomination as candidate for mayor of his town. The election comes off next week. It has placed me, therefore, as Senators will see, in the embarrassing position of having induced this gentleman to accept a nomination upon the promise of the chairman of the committee to report the bill back immediately for action. I therefore think that it is not asking too much for me to appeal to the Senate to act immediately upon this bill. Other gentlemen similarly situated have been relieved of their disabilities. I shall be very glad if it is the pleasure of the Senate to relieve this gentleman. At any rate, I shall be glad if they will relieve me from the embarrassing position which I am now in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill reported by the Senator from Iowa. Is there objection?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I object. It can come up in the morning hour to-morrow. I think we ought to go to the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine objects. The Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

Mr. GORDON. I desire then to give notice that I will ask the attention of the Senate to it at an early moment after the morning hour expires.

MARTHA E. NORTHUP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the bill on the Calendar which was left unfinished yesterday morning.

The CHIEF CLERK. The bill pending yesterday morning was the bill (H. R. No. 1122) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha E. Northup, widow of First Lieutenant Edward B. Northup, late of the Seventeenth United States Infantry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WEST. That was the bill which was up yesterday just at the close of the morning hour, on which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. OGLESBY] was making some explanation to the Senate as to the policy of passing it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no power to call the Senator back to his feet.

Mr. WEST. Well, I call him back.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to this bill, and shall vote for it. But I understood the Senator from Connecticut, who is now absent, [Mr. FERRY,] and who is never absent when he is well, said that he desired to make some remarks upon it. That is my impression. I think therefore it should go over until he returns.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I hope it will go over.

Mr. FENTON. I want to say that I am well advised that a full explanation in regard to this case has been made to the honorable Senator from Connecticut, and that he has said that it was not his desire to further oppose the passage of the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I have no objection. I merely spoke in his behalf.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. SARGENT. I think sufficient has been shown in reference to this bill to induce some Senators to desire to have a record on it. Certainly the committee have shown in their report the strongest reasons why this bill ought not to pass. They have not shown any good reason, except the sympathy of a majority of the committee, why it should pass, if that is a good reason, and I deny that that is. In the next place I desire a record, because I think the Senate ought by some means to express its opinion of this endeavor to pass bills through without reading the reports which come from committees, although they may be honored and careful committees, as the one in question is, without calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that this is a departure from the ordinary legislation on such subjects, a departure from the equities of the law recognized by our general statutes.

I do not mean that attention should be called to it merely in a report which is printed and laid on our desks, and which we may see or may not see, but by rising and saying, "The committee think it is an exceptional case. It is true this man died in a fit of delirium tremens; it is true that to grant a pension under these circumstances would demoralize the service; it is true, as is stated in the printed report, that there can be no good reason for it; but our sympathies are overcome; we have received private letters; and therefore we ask the Senate to allow this pension." If members of the committee would only get up and say as much as that, which they do say in print, which may not meet our eyes and would not have been observed if I had not called for the reading of the report yesterday, the Senate could determine whether it would administer this rough equity, or whether it would allow it to be determined in the bosom of the Pension Committee and permit that committee secretly to dispense with the general laws on the subject. Now I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. As the yeas and nays are to be called, I simply wish to say that I shall have to vote "nay," not that I care any more, I suppose, about the amount of money this bill will take out of the Treasury than any other Senator about me who is in favor of the passage of the bill; but the amount of money, I take it, which is involved in the bill is very much larger than any sum that will ever go to this pensioner. One such precedent as this is the opening to a great many claims upon the Treasury that I have never been able to compute, and never have seen a computation of.

Mr. OGLESBY. It is manifest that some explanation ought to be made to the Senate in regard to this bill. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Pensions, if I am correctly informed, has established for himself, most justly, a very commendable reputation for great prudence and care in passing upon pension cases. If the members of that committee were called upon to give their experience before this body in regard to his care, and I might go a little further and say in regard to the prudence and care of all the members of that committee, I venture the prediction that it would be accepted here as highly favorable. A great many cases are referred to that committee from the House of Representatives and from this body, in which members are personally interested—I mean interested so far as kind feeling governs them—and individuals from various portions of the country are more seriously interested, and which they press before the committee for favorable consideration. The Calendar will show, I think, that for one that is favorably recommended from that committee more than ten are rejected by it.

Mr. President, this was a peculiar case. The evidence before the committee, when the report was first written which has been read here, was purely one-sided evidence. There was nothing before the committee except the finding of the coroner's jury. We knew nothing of the facts of the case except as it came to us from the House and that verdict of the coroner's jury, that Lieutenant Northup had died under the influence of intoxicating liquors through an overdose of chloral taken by him in the absence of his nurse, unwittingly, not intentionally, which produced death. Thereupon the impression was left upon the mind of the committee that he was a habitual drinker, that he was an intemperate officer. I confess that was the impression of almost all the members of the committee, and the chairman of the committee was accordingly instructed to report against the bill. The chairman of the committee thereupon wrote out the report which has been read here, with the purpose of reporting against the bill.

Subsequently, two witnesses, officers in the same regiment with Lieutenant Northup, appeared before the committee and testified as to his habits in regard to intoxicating liquors, and instead of being a habitual drinker, or a drinker at all, it turns out that the man had a reputation for sobriety; that he was almost a total-abstinence man; that about a year previous to this time he had taken liquor once, and in a moment became intoxicated; that he always subsequently abstained from the use of intoxicating liquor, because he could not touch it without being subjected to its influence. On his return, after the expiration of a leave of absence, to his command in Dakota Territory, he stopped in Sioux City, and if there is any evidence on the point at all, it is that he went and took one drink, or drank some liquor, and was instantly thrown in the condition in which he had been a year before, and never before while in the service; but in that condition, overcome by the use of ardent spirits, he took a dose of chloral in the absence of his nurse. There being nobody to make an explanation for the officer, his wife being at home in another State, his regiment some miles from him in Dakota Territory, with no one to explain about his habits, it was reasonable enough that the coroner's inquest should have reported as they did.

We accepted that report; but when two officers in his command, who had known him for six or seven years, who had served with him when he was a private in the ranks, a volunteer, who had served with him in his various promotions in the volunteer service, and had served with him in the regular Army when he was placed there as a lieutenant in consequence of meritorious service as a soldier, who served with him all along until his death, testified as to his habits of sobriety, as to his uniform good conduct as a soldier, that he was an extra good soldier who had received wounds in battle and left a poor family behind him, the committee reconsidered their finding. The chairman of the committee, however, in making this report left it as it was in the first instance, without adding in detail the additional evidence, and made a favorable report in a few lines at the bottom; but, as he had the candor to state yesterday to the Senate, you have all the facts in the case laid before you. The committee, I believe, were unanimous, or perhaps there may have been one objection to it, in reconsidering their first action and recommending the granting of a pension in this case.

Of course Lieutenant Northup was not with his regiment, but he was absent under a leave of absence granted to him by the War Department and was returning to duty before his leave had expired, and therefore was in the line of his duty. A man is not required to be in the field, a man is not required to be armed and equipped, to be in the line of his duty. No such interpretation has ever been given to the term "line of duty." If a soldier dies at home and has a legitimate and lawful furlough granted to him, he dies in the line of his duty. If a soldier dies in hospital, relieved from duty, he dies in the line of his duty. A man is not required to be under drill and in the field, and the decisions of the Attorney-General do not put any such construction upon the term "line of duty." This man was returning to his post of duty before his leave of absence had expired, was overtaken in this calamitous way, and then fell dead by an overdose of chloral.

I think this pension should be granted in view of the surrounding circumstances, which are not fully stated in this report because the multifarious business pressing upon us all the time drives us to the necessity of making brief reports and putting in only the facts. So the committee thought, and so, speaking for the committee now, I think it is but a matter of justice to grant this pension. Of course it is not within the line recognized by the general pension laws. There would be no necessity for a Committee on Pensions in this body if we were never to go outside of the regularly established laws on the subject of pensions. We have a well-defined pension system, but there are hundreds and thousands of soldiers who cannot obtain the benefit of our pension system under the general laws; and for their benefit, and that justice may be done, a committee is appointed here to hear special cases that vary from the general character of pension applications. We have gone as far, and I think I can with the sanction of the committee say we have in this instance gone farther than in any other. But we thought the circumstances would justify a reasonable departure from the general rule, and therefore we have recommended this pension.

This is all there is in the case. If it shall be the good-will of the Senate to grant this widow a pension, I shall be very glad of it. If not, they can dispose of it otherwise, and I shall have no more trouble with the case.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think from the statement made by the committee I should vote for this pension; but I submit to the committee that it would be better to have the bill referred back to them that they may make a report which will state the facts mentioned in the course of the debate, so that it may not be a bad precedent upon the record. Therefore I move that the bill be recommitted to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. THURMAN. I cannot see any object in referring the bill back to the committee except to have a more full report upon this case; but no report will be any more full than the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which can always be referred to if the case be brought up as a precedent.

Without knowing anything about the particular merits of this case, I have only to say that if we are to refuse forever to give to the widow of an officer, however gallant he may have been, however well he may have discharged his duty, any pension, because the man unfortunately once or twice in his life got drunk, we shall set up a standard that will not be very favorable, as I think, to the service or to justice. I am not very much in favor of this strict inquiry into a man's stomach. A man who has discharged his duty for years faithfully, and been a gallant officer, I do not think is to be written down as one unworthy of the remembrance of his country because some time or other in his life he happened to get drunk. I shall vote for this bill, and vote for it cheerfully.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator from Ohio or any one else understood me as opposing the passage of this bill because the husband of this claimant some time got drunk, he misunderstood me, or I misunderstood myself. I do not think that that would be a good reason for denying a pension to the widow of a soldier who had lost his life in the service of his country. I certainly should not plead any individual instance of intemperance, nor any habit of intemperance, as a bar to such a claim as that. I understood when this case was first presented, and I understand to-day upon the more elaborate statement of the honorable Senator from Illinois, that this is not the case of a soldier who lost his life in the service of his country, but it is the case of a soldier who sacrificed his life by the indulgence of a bad appetite.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. How could he have delirium tremens unless he got drunk?

Mr. HOWE. I do not care to go into the question suggested by my friend from Vermont, how could he have had the delirium tremens if he had never been drunk before? I do not know but that it is entirely within the reach of human achievement to drink one's self into delirium tremens the first time tried. I believe there are but few who accomplish that. But that is not the point. If he had been sober all the rest of his life, here is the fact: he did not lay down his life in the service of his country; it was not because of any danger to which he had been exposed in that service that he sacrificed his life. Now, if my honorable friend from Indiana, whose conscientious prudence I know as well as any man in this Chamber, or if the honorable Senator from Illinois can tell how, after we have voted a pension to this widow, we can contrive to turn away from our door any widow of a soldier who has been in the service, and has done his duty in the service and died afterward, then they can find some reason for passing this bill and not putting every widow in the country on the pension-roll; but unless they can discriminate between this case and every other case to which I have referred, I do not see how we can safely vote for this bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish merely to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the pension-roll now is between thirty and forty million dollars. That is the amount we annually appropriate. That amount I think no one will begrudge to those who really deserve it; to those who were crippled during the war, and to the heirs and representatives of those who have died from wounds or disease contracted in the war. But in order that the Government may be enabled to reward cases like these, and to show its gratitude to those who have well served it, it is all the more necessary that we do not improperly enlarge the cases to which this bounty is extended.

I understand that by the pension laws, where a person dies from exposure or wounds in the service of the United States, his heirs—his widow and his orphans—are entitled to a certain pension. Now, does the case which we are considering come within this rule? The Senator from Ohio says that because a person some time in his life was intoxicated, that should not bar him from sympathy. I admit that. I was making no such argument, and the opposition to this bill springs from no such idea; but it is a question whether he died from honorable wounds received in the service. That is rebutted by the fact stated by the committee, that he died from excessive drinking; that he was not at the time in the service; that he was on leave with a furlough; that he stopped at Sioux City, and there became excessively intoxicated. It is strange that he should become so if he was a temperate man; but he became excessively intoxicated, and while so, mercifully say the jury of inquest, without criminal intent, he took his own life; he took a drug which caused his death. That does not come within the rule which allows pensions to be granted to the widows and heirs of persons who have died on account of wounds or disability contracted in the service.

I received last evening a letter from a person who stated that he had lost both of his eyes and both of his arms in the service of the United States; that he was entirely helpless; that he needed an attendant; and that the amount of pension granted to him by the United States was so small that he could scarcely live; that he could make no effective exertions to maintain himself; and he begged me in my humanity to vote for any measure which might increase the amount of pensions of this class of cases. I think that that application is extremely meritorious. I think that such persons should receive a larger pension; and in order to do it of course we have got to run up above the $35,000,000 we now pay. We may, perhaps, for cases of that character find that by and by this pension-roll may be swelled even to $100,000,000; and if every dollar of it is properly applied, if we are satisfied that it goes into the hands of those who really deserve it, that the beneficent intentions of Congress are carried out, and that every dollar is received by a soldier, widow, or orphan, who is entitled to consideration at our hands, then we shall not regret it, and I shall vote for it most cheerfully. But when it comes down to a mere question of whether charity shall be extended to persons who are not entitled to it by any law we have ever put on our statute-book, and all those laws are to be dispensed with simply in the case of a person who is pressed with a little more warmth on our attention by outside influences than the great body of those who are more deserving, then I say that the amount by which it swells our pension-rolls is liable to suspicion, and the people may well complain that we tax them without due regard to the objects of expenditure. Every one of the thirty or forty million dollars which we appropriate goes out to individuals. They are little grains of sand which make the mountain; little drops of water which make this great stream which flows out of the Treasury; and this addition, if it is improperly made, is an encouragement to other improper additions

I have again to say, and I desire to call the attention of the committee to it, that I am afraid of these pension bills and these propositions to increase pensions which come from the committee and are carried through here as a matter of course, when the very first one upon which daylight is let in shows features which lead so many Senators to doubt whether it ought to pass. I say we ought to have some deliberation in this matter; that our pension-rolls are growing too fast; that we have not enough deliberation; and that we find the committee intrusted with this matter as the organ of the Senate is either too much excited by its sympathy or does not consider with sufficient discrimination, for some reason, between cases which are meritorious and cases which are not meritorious.

I trust that the motion will prevail to refer this bill back in order that, if this is a case where a pension ought to be granted, there may be a report establishing that fact. Certainly the report now before the Senate shows exactly the opposite result.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey to recommit the bill to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1385) to regulate commerce by railroad among the several States; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CURRENCY AND BANKING.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumes the consideration of the bill (S. No. 617) to provide for the redemption and reissue of United States notes and for free banking.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to make one inquiry. I understand the pending amendment is the one offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. WRIGHT. I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the first section, and I wish to make an inquiry. While the Chair held yesterday that it would not be in order to take the vote on my amendment, which was quite right, nevertheless I suppose that that amendment is pending, subject to the right to amend the section before the vote is taken on my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. WRIGHT. And when the vote is taken on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] if no other amendments are offered to the original text, mine will be the pending amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the pending amendment be agreed to, or disagreed to, then the amendment of the Senator from Iowa will be in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. In order to expedite the progress of this bill, I move to take from the table, in pursuance of the notice I gave yesterday, the resolution to fix a limit to debate, and I hope Senators will give us a vote on that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] is entitled to the floor on the bill. Does he yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to lay aside informally the pending bill and proceed to the consideration of the resolution introduced by him, which will be reported.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have modified it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution as modified now reads:

Resolved, That after three o'clock to-day debate on amendments to the pending bill shall be confined to ten minutes by each Senator; and it shall be in order during its pendency to move a recess from five to half-past seven o'clock p. m.

Mr. BAYARD. On each occasion that this suggestion has been made of putting an arbitrary limitation on debate in the Senate I have entered an objection. It is with me not only, as I have stated, a question of principle, but I may add it is also a question of feeling. If limitations on debate in the Senate are ever proper to be applied, it is on what may be termed mere business bills, appropriation bills relating to subjects which have been thoroughly sifted by the estimates of the Departments and the examination of our committees, in regard to which information in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred can be asked for in one moment and answered almost in the next. I do not think that members of the Senate should be driven to what may be called the subterfuge—not using the word in a disrespectful sense—of offering immaterial amendments or of submitting dilatory motions of postponement for the purpose of having opportunity for that debate which in their judgment and conscience is necessary for the information of the Senate and for the proper elucidation of the questions submitted. I hope that the Senate will not, upon a measure like this, than which any question more vital has not in my opinion been before Congress since the time in 1862 when irredeemable paper money was first made legal tender by the act of the Congress of the United States, impose an arbitrary restriction on debate. I trust that the limitation upon this debate may be found in the conscience and sense of self-respect of each individual Senator. So far as this measure is concerned, I do not know that I have any intention to trespass even for ten minutes upon the time of the Senate; but I hope that no such limitation will be adopted, and that the Senate may simply proceed to consider this question with that dignity and sense of self-respect which they owe to themselves and the magnitude and gravity of the matters under consideration.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, that the Senator from Delaware from a high sense of duty opposes this resolution I know; that he does it from a conscientious sense of duty I know; but that Senator ought to know that men differ in opinion, and that while he expresses his opinions here, there are others of us who are entitled also to ours. Now, sir, I shall vote for the resolution; I shall vote for it cheerfully, because, in the language used by the Senator from Ohio farthest from me yesterday, [Mr. THURMAN,] and in language similar to that which I had used at an earlier day, I think this debate has extended to a point where it is criminal to continue it much further. I want to see free and reasonable debate upon all questions here. I believe that we have the best Government in the world. I think we all concur in that opinion, and yet it is not a Government without its faults, and if I were to name to-day the great fault in our Government, it would be that interminable disposition to talk which exists in the Congress of the United States. I believe that is one of the fundamental evils of our Government, by which no other government on all this globe is afflicted. There are some of us here who are non-talking men, and the non-talking men have some rights as well as the men who speak almost interminably. I claim to be very nearly within that class of non-talking men. I have sat here in patience for four mortal months listening to speech after speech of gentlemen who saw fit to address empty seats. And how much were the members of the body enlightened by that discussion thus long drawn out? Every Senator of course will be controlled by his own obligations and his own sense of duty, but I say that there comes now from the remotest corners of your country a cry that we ought to heed, that it is time to act. I confess I was pained when my friend from Delaware yesterday objected to agreeing unanimously to a mode of concluding this discussion.

I do not want to see limitations placed upon debate here, other than those that Senators shall agree upon; but I do see the time hastening on when an ability to discharge our duties here will demand of us to put limitations by rule upon debate; and when we have discussed a matter for four long mortal months, and then there come objections to a limitation and we do not know that the debate will not be extended four other months, I see that that is a proceeding which will hasten the restrictions of debate because those restrictions will absolutely be demanded. I think, therefore, that it would have been wiser to adopt the course suggested yesterday. I would have preferred it much to this resolution.

Now, there are only three modes of closing this debate. One is by a unanimous consent. To that, from a sense of duty, the Senator from Delaware interposes an objection. The second would be by sitting here and exercising physical endurance without adjournment. The third is the proposition before us. I can conceive of no other way; and as I rather prefer that we should do it in a little more quiet manner, and a manner a little more agreeable to Senators than that of physical endurance, I prefer this to an uninterrupted sitting. We can get to the question in only one of these three ways, and I shall vote cheerfully for this resolution. And I think if we are driven after such protracted debate to this resort, it furnishes a hand-writing that all can read that we must come by rules to some reasonable limitations upon what I call the abuses of debate. Less talk and more prompt action is what the country demands.

Why, sir, we have a large number of subjects upon which we shall be obliged to hear Senators. We shall have, I apprehend, in a few days, a report from the Committee on Transportation. That is a question in which Senators from the West think they are particularly interested. I only want to say to them that they have no more interest in it than we in the East have. We have a mutuality of interest that is precisely equal. You want transportation cheap; we want it. We have questions relating to Louisiana; the distribution of the Geneva award, which long since should have been acted upon; we have a variety of other important questions; and if we are to discuss, without ever coming to a conclusion, this one, what time shall we have within the life of man when we shall discuss these others?

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Maine is aware of the natural dislike the minority have to a limitation of debate by an order of the Senate; but I think that every one here agrees that this debate has gone far enough, and I think it is extremely probable, though I do not know how the fact is, that by unanimous consent we can agree to stop the debate.

Mr. HAMLIN. We tried that last night, but the Senator from Delaware felt it his duty to interpose an objection.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish it were tried this morning, and let us agree by unanimous consent to the proposition now made.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am on the floor. Outside of the pending resolution, by unanimous consent, I will make a suggestion.

Mr. THURMAN. By unanimous consent let this be the understanding.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; without entering it upon the Journal.

Mr. HAMLIN. My friend from New York [Mr. CONKLING] makes a very pertinent suggestion to me, and that is, upon the pending question who is the majority and who is the minority. It is a little doubtful.

Mr. THURMAN. I was not speaking about the pending question, but there are minorities in all legislative bodies who are naturally jealous of such a proposition.

Mr. HAMLIN. This only applies to the pending question. Who the majority is or minority is, I think we know enough now to say that we cannot tell before we get to the vote. But I will make the proposition, and I hope my friend from Delaware will agree to it, that at three o'clock to-day we shall proceed to vote upon the bill and amendments, subject only to ten-minute speeches by each Senator.

Mr. THURMAN. That is it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I said that I preferred to have it done by unanimous consent, and I make that proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Maine proposes that, by unanimous consent, at three o'clock the Senate proceed to vote on the bill and amendments, with speeches of only ten minutes on each amendment by each Senator. Is that objected to?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. This does not embrace the proposition of the Senator from Ohio for evening sessions, I understand.

Mr. HAMLIN. O, no.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Ohio withdraws his proposition if this is agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senate if they will not be willing to extend this consent so that the Senate may, if it choose, hold a session in the evening.

Mr. HAMLIN. That can be done subsequently.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, I withdraw that proposition. I am willing to stand on the general understanding stated by the Senator from Maine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the proposition again. It is that at three o'clock the Senate proceed to vote on the bill and amendments, and that after that time debate be limited to ten minutes by each Senator on any amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Undoubtedly the question which is now before us is one of greater gravity than we have had for many years, or will be likely to have for many years to come. I had not expected to say another word upon this subject, and I believe I made a sort of promise to my friend from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] that I would be as modest as he would be in relation to debate on this bill and the amendments to it; but an amendment has been proposed to increase the amount of United States notes, legal-tenders commonly called, from the sum now actually out, $382,000,000, to $400,000,000. That is a proposition of such a pernicious character that I do desire to talk upon it, although the Senator from Maine is fatigued with the amount of talk that has been had upon this general subject of finance. I have not occupied over half an hour since the fore part of December on this question. I have spoken twice about fifteen minutes since I made a speech early in December, and have not otherwise occupied the attention of the Senate. But upon that question I do desire to occupy fifteen or twenty minutes, and therefore I do not want to be limited to ten minutes. There are other Senators who are here to-day who will require fifteen or twenty minutes, as I have understood. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] I understand has not concluded his remarks. The Senator from New York [Mr. FENTON] desires to occupy a little time to-day upon the general subject, as I have learned. Therefore, while it is not my purpose to prolong the debate, for I am as anxious to reach an early conclusion of it as any Senator here, I do not wish to be debarred of the privilege, when the amendment comes up to increase the amount of legal-tender notes to $400,000,000, of occupying sufficient time to discuss it as I may think fit.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt that under the circumstances the Senate would agree that the Senator from Vermont should have the privilege, when that amendment is pending, of occupying twenty minutes.

Mr. THURMAN. He can speak upon it now, before it is offered.

Mr. HAMLIN. Allow me to change my proposition to half-past three o'clock, and that will give two hours.

Several SENATORS. Say four o'clock.

Mr. HAMLIN. Very well, say four o'clock; only fix some time when we can stop this talk.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am very willing to take any time. I wish it distinctly understood, though, that in agreeing to this, which I do heartily, I do not doubt the power of the Senate to prescribe rules as to debate; and while I am willing to have the thing done by general consent, yet the Senate of the United States has a right and ought to exercise the power to prescribe limitations of debate in my judgment. But that is another matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine proposes that at four o'clock to-day the Senate will proceed to vote upon the pending bill and the amendments, and that after that hour debate shall be limited to ten minutes by each Senator upon each proposition.

Mr. THURMAN. But it is understood that no vote is to be taken until four o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is involved in the proposition. Is the proposition agreed to? [A pause.] The Chair hears no objection; and it is so ordered.

[Mr. SCOTT addressed the Senate, concluding the speech begun by him yesterday. His speech in full will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. FENTON. Mr. President, my views upon the great financial problem which the country has to solve, embracing the questions of debt and taxation, banking and currency, are well known. I need not repeat them, and my only purpose in rising now is to offer a few words upon the particular measure before the Senate. The people expect a decision from us upon this question so vitally connected with the every-day business of the country; they must know what they are to stand upon. I despair of getting just what I think is best, and must content myself with brief reasons for opposing what I think will make the condition worse.

I suppose it is not altogether strange that we so widely disagree. We come here from States and from districts differing in pursuits and in degree of prosperity. Here commerce prevails, there manufactures, and in another quarter we find agriculture the leading industry. On the one hand is seen comparative wealth, the result of older settlement and years of accumulation; and on the other, comparative want, the result of sparse population in newer countries, and the waste which followed in the train of armies through a prolonged war. So, with these various occupations, aims, and needs it is not surprising that we disclose a variety of views. Besides, the law of money and its uses as a medium of exchange and as a representative or standard of value, while perfectly simple, always leads to great conflict of opinion when specific remedies are sought for a disordered and unsound condition. It has been so in our own and other countries in past periods.

But, after all the diversity of opinion, we have a common interest, and I deprecate the sectional aspect which has been given to the question during the debate—the appeal on this or that side on the ground of locality. The interests of the East and the West, the North and the South, are inseparable. Whatever benefits the sea-board also benefits the interior and West, and so in return. The agriculture of the West and South, nor the manufactures and trade of the East, are exempt from the reciprocal advantages of the prosperity of either. So, also, what affects one class or one section adversely must be felt in some degree by all the others. Thus it is that in the exchanges of production, in the facilities for doing business, in the transactions of capital, and in the compensations of labor, we can regard our whole country bound together by common interests. There are no creations of capital in New York and Massachusetts antagonizing the growth and prosperity of Illinois and Georgia.

I confess the Congress is at sea upon this subject of currency. It has seemed to me from the beginning that a great want in the attempt to reach a solution of our difficulties was a clear voice from the Treasury Department and the Executive Mansion; a bugle note, if you please, sounding the policy of a campaign for a restored money condition. The need of some one who, by reason of his position, could speak with greater authority and influence is apparent; some one whose appeal would be likely to bring together a party, not alone of republicans or of democrats, but a majority in support of a policy which had been conceived with care and in thoughtful council. If it was not the very best plan, one that should not be wholly ill, so that all could see and know that we were on the way that does not lead to frequent ambush, to greater uncertainty, or to doubting and despair.

But I turn to this bill. Agreeing with the chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. SHERMAN] in all he says concerning the importance of a return to specie payments, I would gladly support any measure which promised to promote that object. I do not see, however, that this bill makes any provision to such an end. There is no sound general principle involved in it.

It has generally been assumed that resumption was a proceeding which required some preparatory steps; that the condition of the country now would not justify it, and could not be adapted to it without some intermediate action. It is certain that we now have an inconvertible paper currency at a depreciation of more than 11 per cent. Clearly, resumption of specie payments means that this currency is to be appreciated 11 per cent. and convertible into coin. Can the change from the one condition to the others be accomplished by increasing the former without making adequate provision, if that were possible, for the latter? Every fair-minded person must answer no.

I do not say by this that I am for a contraction of the volume of money. Nor do I discuss the question whether the country needs more or less currency. The present amount, even though well diffused, is none too great, I suppose, for the requirements of business at present prices.

The real question is, what are the conditions upon which specie payments can be restored and maintained, and whether we will adopt measures that will tend gradually to such a result.

If we take the affirmative of this inquiry we must abandon the bill before us; for it not only sanctions a further increase of the currency volume, but it makes no provision for a return to the specie condition, however remote. To be sure it says that coin or 5 per cent. bonds shall be given to any holder of $1,000 in legal-tender notes, or any multiple thereof, from and after January 1, 1876, upon presentation to the assistant treasurer in the city of New York, or at the office of the United States Treasurer in Washington; but it affords no prospect, not even a probability, of coin payments. So far as the theory of the bill is concerned, we might begin the work it proposes to-morrow with equal assurance of being in a situation to give anything but bonds in exchange for legal-tender notes.

I do not maintain that we must necessarily diminish the volume of money—embracing both currency and coin—in the moderate process of a wise policy for specie payments. What I do say is, that we cannot resume and maintain the specie condition upon the present currency volume; that some intermediate preparation must be made before we can do it at all. It is possible that a limited gradual reduction of paper money may be made good by an equivalent increase of specie money, until the true relation between the two was established. In a word, when we adopt correct principles the question of the amount of currency will settle itself, in harmony with the demands of industry and trade. As we look through the bill before us, however, for some sure guide to safe ground, we find none at all. I submit, it is rather a bill to perpetuate the very evils of which we complain, namely, a depreciated and inconvertible currency condition.

The assertion of the principle of free banking in the bill meets my approval. The details, however, as we here find them, are inconsistent with the principle, and make it alike uncertain and unsafe. I pass over the limitations of banking facilities upon the basis of the currency authorized for New York under the present law as not material to the point I make. If free banking and an arbitrary limitation of it seems like a paradox, it is not my fault. I am very certain, if we had already attained to specie payments, there could be no question about the wisdom of establishing the free system and removing all restraint upon the amount of circulation of the banks, so far as it should be well secured. And I am not very reluctant to adopt the system now, but let it be absolutely free, provided the banks redeem their notes at their own counters and at the redemption centers at par. We should thus take it out of the power of the Government to fix the quantity of circulation, and leave that, as it should be left, to the wants of the people.

The redemptions may begin with legal-tenders, so that there is a gradual reduction, and the banks in the mean time required to hold a part of the interest on their gold bonds deposited to secure their circulation. The process should be slow; and it might even be wise to limit the reduction of legal-tender until the experiment was fairly tested by experience. But it seems very plain if the national-bank notes were divested of their semi-legal-tender character, it would facilitate the working of the system, if it was not indeed a necessary part of its success. To abolish this characteristic of the national-bank note, and that compelling a bank to accept the notes of other banks in payment of debts due to it, would no doubt accomplish all that was necessary in this direction to perfect the system. Add to this the redemption of the fractional currency in coin as fast as the coinage could be made ready, and we should have fairly entered upon a course, without hampering business by severe contraction, which would finally lead us to full and complete resumption of specie payments. I cannot, however, dwell upon the details of a plan not before us; it is enough for my present purpose to add that the provision for free banking in this bill has none of the redemption features so essential to safety and success.

I am further opposed to this bill because of the authority to convert and reconvert legal-tenders and bonds, for almost the same reason that I have always distrusted the wisdom of giving the Secretary of the Treasury power over the currency of the country. It is a prodigious power in the hands of one man, and unless exercised with the utmost integrity, care, and foresight, it may be turned to the detriment of legitimate business, and perform acts of gross partiality on the one hand and gross injustice on the other.

Then, again, if we did not witness under the operations of this convertible feature of the bill a heavy call for bonds, and temporarily, at least, sharp and ruinous contraction, it would be a fortunate escape from what now looks like a serious risk. But it is answered that the Secretary has power to meet the emergency by reissuing legal-tenders. This is true, and such a course, faithfully pursued, might meet one difficulty, but it would involve others. This would be to increase, gradually, the public debt; to replenish the supply of legal-tenders which had been diverted from circulation for redemption; to produce fresh demands upon the Treasury, and to travel over the same circuit again, all the time getting in a worse condition. The operation of this feature of the bill would be bad enough in the hands of an able and upright officer; with any other, it would be an authority alike dangerous and corrupting.

I will not dwell upon the proposition to legalize the $26,000,000 overissue of the so-called reserve, without warrant of law. Nor will I pursue the fact that the whole theory of the bill is to somewhat expand an already debased currency. To such or any expansion I cannot consent; it is not the way to solid ground, but on the contrary tends from it. I shall give my vote to no proposition which leads, as an increase now clearly would, to greater depths of difficulty and danger.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of entering into this debate; but as we are about to vote on many propositions, and some of them not at all in accordance with my views, it is perhaps proper for me to submit a remark or two upon the subject. I have listened with patience, with interest, and I hope too with instruction, to the general debate on what is called the financial question. I am so deeply impressed with the necessity of a return to a metallic basis that I will vote for any measure, almost, calculated to secure it. I am opposed, as much so as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] and the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] to the close monopoly of the present national-banking system, and I will co-operate with them in any wise and effective measure to destroy this monopoly. I opposed the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] because it was liable to flood the country with an irredeemable paper currency. Such a policy, so unwise, so unsound, and so fatal to the substantial interests of the people, never can receive my sanction—a policy that I hold to be a crime against our civilization, a sin against labor, and a reproach to our people and to their institutions.

Mr. President, I am for a hard-money basis, and for it as soon as I can get it—to-day rather than to-morrow.

I am one of those who have no faith in the doctrine of the day, that seems to prevail with some, that we should make paper a substitute for gold and silver. I want no such substitution. I want no attempted substitution, for it must end in signal failure and in consequent disaster; while I am willing to support any measure, though not in itself satisfactory to me, nor yet so sound in principle, which promises something toward the accomplishment of the great object. In the establishment again of a metallic basis I have my own views of what ought to be done at this time, and which differ entirely from any that have been submitted during the debate.

I would inaugurate another policy, and it is simply this, without any elaboration, for it is not my design to make extended remarks:

First. I would repeal the legal-tender act.

Secondly. Repeal the tax upon State-bank circulation.

Thirdly. Suppress the fractional and other currency under the denomination of five dollars.

Do this, and in my judgment we would do much toward relieving the country from the instability of values; from the troubles, whether real or imaginary, growing out of the present condition of the currency, and at the same time afford ample facilities for local banking.

I despair of seeing any such counsels prevail at this time; or any counsels in fact tending to a separation of the Government from banking and from paper money. Upon the contrary, there is a public sentiment which appears to be wild, if not absolutely reckless, upon the subject of paper money. Have we now, in a state of profound peace, with our immense productive resources, and our large, intelligent, and enterprising population, gone back to the days of 1776, when our ancestors, in the frenzy of distress and disaster undertook to carry their country through to a successful issue upon an irredeemable paper currency? Failing in that and almost wrecking their cause by it, of which history and tradition both teach us, and all knowing the truth of it, yet there are gentlemen who really attribute the merit to this paper money of carrying the country safely through the late civil war. A greater error never rested in the human mind. It was a vice then as it is a vice now. The United States legal-tender currency was both an error and a crime then; and it continues to this day to be an error and a crime both. No, sir; it was not paper money; it was the Mississippi River that would not be divided into parts, combined with the staunch capital of the North that refused to be separated from the land upon which it grew fat and strong, that did it all.

Your irredeemable paper money did nothing but demoralize, lessen the public virtue, and it may be no exaggeration to say that it doubled the cost of the war. But, Mr. President, I must adhere to my purpose, and not trouble the Senate with general reflections. I have submitted a proposition for an amendment to the Constitution, so as to provide against anything being a legal tender in payment of debts but gold and silver; and as soon as a favorable opportunity occurs I shall call it to the attention of the Senate, and shall reserve until then what I might very appropriately say now were it not that all the propositions before us are, I may say, exclusively paper. There is but little gold in any that I see. It is paper upon either side and all round; and in fact I may be in this anomalous condition of being obliged to vote for paper in order to get rid of paper.

I shall most certainly vote for any tangible paper currency that has a promise or holds out a hope of resumption in order to supplant the present irredeemable currency that is afflicting our industries. A vote for any kind of paper currency not at once redeemable in gold and silver is a most disagreeable thing to me. Nothing could be more agreeable to my feelings and views than a vote to-day by which we would advance at once toward the acknowledged standard of values. I do not fear it. We might suffer some, no doubt would; but the country would soon adjust itself to the great result, and deeper and broader would the foundations of its greatness and prosperity be laid. All would soon rejoice in being out of the whirlpool, the maelstrom of irredeemable paper money which has been deluging the land, demoralizing the people, and crippling their productive resources.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, it seems to be the supposition of some Senators here that if an argument or position is not reiterated from day to day, it has been abandoned and the argument or position surrendered. Now, I am not disposed here to repeat arguments that I have made on former occasions upon this subject, nor am I disposed to make any lengthy speech at all. I shall merely present the skeleton of the few points that I deem it necessary to keep in view after this long debate.

Mr. President, it is obvious from the tenor of the amendments that have been presented or indicated, and from the array of Senators here on one side and the other, that we are about to take a new departure; we are to bid farewell, a long farewell, to coin as a circulating medium for an indefinite period of years, and are about to inaugurate a paper system, an exclusively paper system; for no Senators here who are in favor of any return in the near future, or in the distant future, to a metallic basis of money would at this moment flood the country with a larger amount of paper than we now have out. I need not say that I have not any faith in these new gospelers, if I may be pardoned the word, who believe gold and silver have become obsolete. I regard the furor that is now raging in relation to that subject as an epidemic. I believe that Senators here now, who are in favor of this depreciated paper system, will in a very short time be quite willing to have their records forgotten. I have no question myself but what the result will prove disastrous to the country, to its business interests, and to its good name.

There is another thing in relation to it that I confess I view with some alarm. Are the great financial interests of the country to be every year adjudicated by Congress? Are we to have the monetary system—the amount of the currency—brought before Congress every year, to be altered and amended and extended or contracted? That is the system which is about to be inaugurated, and it cannot result in anything else than perpetual disaster.

Mr. President, let us see what injustice we are inflicting now on the mining States and the Territories of the country. By not making any use of the precious metals for the purpose of coinage, we are reducing the value of the productions of every mining State and Territory to a greater amount than their annual taxes. Is that just? If the Government of the country were to use their annual product for the coinage of the country, we should thereby increase its value by not less perhaps than 2 per cent., and to that extent we now deprive every State and Territory which is properly called a mining State or Territory of the former proper value of its product. We also diminish the enterprise and the industry of those States and Territories, for, if a higher value was placed upon their product, their energies would be more powerfully exerted to produce a larger quantity of the precious metals.

There is another question in relation to this matter. It seems to be constantly supposed that our country is too poor to undertake to resume specie payments; and when we speak of a resumption of specie payments, nobody expects it to be done instanter; nobody expects it to be done without proper preparation. But if we were not too poor in 1791 to redeem our depreciated paper, and to lift our money and credit on a level with that of the world, we are not too poor in 1874. Senators who have read the report of Mr. Hamilton, and in my judgment it is, perhaps, the most able state paper that is to be found in the archives of the country—Senators who are familiar with that paper will see the difficulties which Hamilton had to encounter; and yet the wealth of the country at that time was not perhaps the one-tenth part of what it is to-day. The only thing essential would be that we should have to part with property for gold or part with securities for gold to an extent sufficient to form a basis that would make our paper equivalent to coin. If we should make this exchange, therefore, and thereby have a currency in all respects sound and useful, we might have so much less of some other property, or so much less of some securities, as would be necessary for this purpose. But there is not the slightest difficulty about it; and it is a sublime absurdity to say that this country is too poor to undertake a resumption of specie payments. Much less favored countries have no difficulty about it. Our national debt might be a hinderance if it was all due on demand, but our bonds run for a term of years, and we shall meet them when they become due.

Then it is said that we never can resume until the balance of trade is in our favor. The facts will show that we never can have the balance in our favor so long as we are on an exclusively paper currency basis. All the facts show that, with every enlargement of the paper currency, our imports have vastly increased above our exports; and that is as sure to follow as the night the day. Gentlemen who will examine that subject and see the amount of paper currency that has been afloat in the country from year to year and the amount of our imports and exports, will see that they follow right along step by step; the difference between the imports and exports nearly always increasing as our paper currency has become enlarged.

Then there is another point. Senators, I have no doubt honestly, tell us that this paper currency is the friend of the poor man. Never was there a greater mistake. I consider it one of the most gigantic frauds ever practiced upon laboring men and the poor to pretend that depreciated paper is to be continued in their interest. Why, sir, what has a poor man but his labor? Will he object to being paid in a better currency than mere paper 12 per cent. below par? Why, sir, all that he consumes he has to pay for in inflated prices. He has nothing to sell except his labor, as a general rule, and he is robbed from day to day of the difference between the inflated basis and what would be a fair exchange of his labor and the products which he and his family consume. True, his wages may be inflated, but not enough to compensate for the increased cost of living. It is the man who has something to sell, something upon which he expects to make a profit, that gains by a paper currency. The laboring man does not get a dollar by this proposed addition to the currency. Who does get it? The people who are well off and have property, which they can turn and shift; men who are alive to chances. They are the parties who can exchange to some speculative advantage whatever they possess for money, not the laboring man.

Mr. President, heretofore we have been proud of the character of American merchants. Mercantile honor has been considered here as of the very highest, loftiest standard. What is it to-day? Is there not some danger that it is becoming a by-word of reproach? Saying nothing of dishonest bankrupts, nothing of defalcations among clerks as well as principal partners, how often do we understand here that the merchant, even the importing merchant, has no other standard of integrity than his own self-interest; that he will pay a customs duty if he is obliged to, but, if he can contrive any mode by which he can avoid it, he will not hesitate to do it. Was that the ancient character of the American merchant? The Government forces a change in the character of his business. Is it not brought about by this calculating of chances on the value of paper money? Not knowing to-day what the value will be to-morrow, it makes every merchant in the country in some respects a gambler.

But, Mr. President, it is sometimes supposed that by adding to the bulk of the currency we are going to add to what is called the money of the country. Never was there a greater mistake than that. We shall only add to its bulk, without adding anything to its value; and if we are to raise the amount, as is proposed by the Senator from Iowa, from $382,000,000 to $400,000,000, in less than ninety days it will take the same amount to transact business then that it takes to-day to transact the business of the country with $18,000,000 less. To illustrate this, let me give you the facts that come to us of the condition of the money market in New York on Monday and on Tuesday of this present week. On Monday the House of Representatives passed a bill, if I may be allowed to refer to it, proposing to raise the amount of legal-tenders which might be issued up to $400,000,000, and the prices of stocks on Tuesday anticipated final and favorable action here, and rose accordingly from 1 to 1½ per cent. all through the list, and some of them more than that. Western Union Telegraph went up from 77⅜ to 79⅞; Lake Shore, from 77⅜ to 78⅝; Ohio and Mississippi, from 30⅛ to 30¾. Just see what the effect of that is. The rise of Ohio and Mississippi is three-fourths of a dollar on thirty dollars, which on $100 is $2.50.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I beg the Senator's pardon. I do not wish to speak more than ten minutes longer, and do not want to be interrupted.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; I merely wanted to put a question about stocks.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. That amounts to 2½ per cent. on $100. If we raise the amount of our outstanding paper currency now from $382,000,000 to $400,000,000, it will be an addition of $18,000,000. Now we have out $354,000,000 of national-bank notes, $382,000,000 of legal-tender, and about $50,000,000 of fractional currency, making $786,000,000 in round numbers. Two and one-eighth per cent. on that just about makes the $18,000,000. So the whole operation of increasing our paper circulation by this amount is discounted in advance, and so it will be to the end. There is no doubt about it. The want next year for more will be just as great as it is now.

Economy is a thing that we all greatly praise. Now I want to put it to the consciences of Senators here, and frankly ask, do you not believe that an inflated and depreciated paper currency increases the personal expenditures of every one of you? Do you not believe that it largely increases the annual cost of conducting this Government far more than the entire interest on the amount of legal-tenders now outstanding? And yet why do we hesitate to take the only practicable means of making any large and permanent reduction in the expenditures of the Government?

But, Mr. President, the theories that have been announced here are so monstrous that I do not know where to find a parallel for them except in a case cited in the history of Macaulay. I want to read a passage or two from Macaulay to show what the future historian of the American Senate will be very likely to say of us:

Before the end of the reign of Charles II several plans were proposed, examined, attacked, and defended. Some pamphleteers maintained that a national bank ought to be under the direction of the king. Others thought that the management ought to be intrusted to the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of the capital. After the revolution the subject was discussed with an animation before unknown. For, under the influence of liberty, the breed of political projectors multiplied exceedingly. A crowd of plans, some of which resemble the fancies of a child, or the dreams of a man in a fever, were pressed on the government. Pre-eminently conspicuous among the political mountebanks, whose busy faces were seen every day in the lobby of the House of Commons were John Briscoe and Hugh Chamberlayne, two projectors worthy to have been members of that academy which Gulliver found at Lagado. These men affirmed that the one cure for every distemper of the state was a land bank. A land bank would work for England miracles such as had never been wrought for Israel; miracles exceeding the heaps of quails and the daily shower of manna. There would be no taxes, and yet the exchequer would be full to overflowing. There would be no poor-rates, for there would be no poor. The income of every land-holder would be doubled; the profits of every merchant would be increased. In short, the island would, to use Briscoe's words, be the paradise of the world. The only losers would be the moneyed men, those worst men of the nation, who had done more injury to the gentry and yeomanry than an invading army from France would have had the heart to do.

These blessed effects the Land Bank was to produce, simply by issuing enormous quantities of notes on landed security. The doctrine of the projectors was that every person who had real property ought to have, besides that property, paper money to the full value of that property. Thus if his estate was worth £2,000, he ought to have his estate and £2,000 in paper money. Both Briscoe and Chamberlayne treated with the greatest contempt the notion that there could be an overissue of paper as long as there was, for every ten-pound note, a piece of land in the country worth ten pounds. Nobody, they said, would accuse a goldsmith of overissuing as long as his vaults contained guineas and crowns to the full value of all the notes which bore his signature. Indeed, no goldsmith had in his vaults guineas and crowns to the full value of all his paper. And was not a square mile of rich land in Taunton Dean at least as well entitled to be called wealth as a bag of gold or silver? The projectors could not deny that many people had a prejudice in favor of the precious metals, and that, therefore, if the Land Bank were bound to cash its notes, it would very soon stop payment. This difficulty they got over by proposing that the notes should be inconvertible, and that everybody should be forced to take them.

He then goes on to say that—

Distress, however, and animosity had made the landed gentlemen credulous. They insisted on referring Chamberlayne's plan to a committee; and the committee reported that the plan was practicable, and would tend to the benefit of the nation. But by this time the united force of demonstration and derision had begun to produce an effect even on the most ignorant rustics in the house. The report lay unnoticed on the table; and the country was saved from a calamity compared with which the defeat of Landen and the loss of the Smyrna fleet would have been blessings.

Mr. President, I very much fear that the future historian will not speak with much greater respect or in more complimentary terms of us at some future day than these men are spoken of by Macaulay.

A single word, sir, in relation to the present bill. There are some very good features in it, and one is the mode and manner of starting upon free banking. I regard that as conservative and rather an ingenious mode of starting free banking. The only objection I have to it is that I would retire dollar for dollar of the legal-tenders as fast as the national-bank notes were issued.

There is an objection I may mention, as to the provision which limits the amount to which greenbacks shall be retired to $300,000,000. I see no propriety in making any such limit. I do not see why it should stop just at that point.

There are some other features in the bill which are in the right direction. I think it is well to limit the amount at starting at some fixed sum, as is done by making New York the standard; but I notice that the amendment proposed to the first section is very adroitly drawn so as not to allude to any future reduction whatever, and therefore I suppose it is understood that the Senators who make that proposition now mean to have this much now, and mean to come forward next year for a larger sum if they so please. But there is nothing that I desire particularly to consume any further time upon. In the ten minutes' debate I shall have an opportunity to discuss these various matters if it should be necessary.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I do not wish to make any remarks; but noticing the course of debate on this bill as it has come from the Finance Committee, in its many wanderings for the last two days, the members of the Finance Committee having all spoken, I believe, I have not heard a man express himself in favor of the bill except the chairman, and I think he is doubtful upon it. If a committee report a bill of this kind as a compromise, and it has no friends, I do not see how they can ask the Senate to vote for it.

Mr. HOWE. I believe the pending question is on a motion submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] to make $400,000,000 the maximum of United States notes.

Mr. WRIGHT. That amendment was withdrawn by the Senator from Missouri, and he accepted mine in place of it; and therefore the pending amendment is that of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] and mine is in the nature of a substitute for the section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was proposed to be done, but finally ruled out of order. Thereupon the Chair understood the Senator from Missouri on the right [Mr. BOGY] to stand by his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. I certainly understood that he had withdrawn his amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator stated that he was willing to do so; but the Chair was then of opinion that the amendment which the Senator from Iowa proposed to offer would not be in order.

Mr. WRIGHT. In order to understand this distinctly, I should like to know from the Senator from Missouri whether he regards his amendment as still pending, to amend the proposition of his colleague so as to make the amount $400,000,000 instead of $356,000,000, or whether he submitted to my amendment?

Mr. BOGY. I signified my willingness to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa. I am yet willing to accept his amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri on the right [Mr. BOGY] withdraws his amendment. Then the question is on the amendment proposed by the other Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ.]

Mr. HOWE. I am ready to vote on that amendment. I had desired to say a few words on the proposition which I supposed was the pending proposition, to make the limit $400,000,000 instead of $356,000,000 or $382,000,000; but if we are required to vote first upon the proposition to reduce from $382,000,000 to $356,000,000, I will yield.

Mr. MORTON. I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the Senator from Indiana asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I should like the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance. My understanding was that no voting should commence until four o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall be happy to have a vote before that time. I certainly did not understand it so. If any Senator wants to speak, he can speak until four o'clock.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I am not disposed to take up time in discussion. I am prepared to vote; but there are several Senators who were here this morning who have left the Senate with the understanding that no voting should take place until four o'clock, and I would not do injustice to any Senator who has left with that impression.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt there are as many absent on one side as on the other.

Mr. ANTHONY. I certainly want to vote as much as anybody, and as much as the chairman of the committee possibly can; but I do think that it was the understanding that we should not vote until four o'clock. I so understood it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I move that the Senator from Rhode Island make a speech until four o'clock. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANTHONY. I will do so. I move that from now to four o'clock we take up the Calendar, laying aside this bill informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection——

Mr. SHERMAN. Before that is done, we ought really to understand that the general debate is ended on the finance bill. ["Yes!" Yes!"] If that is the understanding, I do not care what is done in the mean time.

Mr. ANTHONY. My impression is that some Senator rose and asked if it was understood that there would be no vote until four o'clock, and it was so stated and understood.

Mr. CONKLING. I must differ with the Senator there. The Senator from Ohio, not in his seat, [Mr. THURMAN,] in reply to a question put by somebody, said he might rely on it that no vote would be taken before four o'clock; but the Senator from Ohio now here [Mr. SHERMAN] said at once that the understanding was, not that the vote should be postponed until four o'clock, but that at four o'clock general debate should cease.

Mr. SHERMAN. I certainly did not say the vote should not be taken until four o'clock.

Mr. MORTON. I have no doubt about the understanding. It was that the vote should not be taken until four o'clock.

Mr. HOWE. Inasmuch as I shall want to occupy ten minutes before I am brought to vote upon the proposition to make the maximum $400,000,000, perhaps the Senate would rather hear me use those ten minutes now than at a later period in the day.

Mr. HAMLIN. We shall be delighted to hear you.

Mr. HOWE. I see by the excitement which pervades the Chamber that the Senate is extremely anxious to hear a short speech. I therefore avail myself of this lull to say a few words.

I shall vote against the motion submitted by the Senator from Missouri on my right, [Mr. SCHURZ;] not because I am persuaded that $356,000,000 of greenbacks is not enough to do the business of this country. I now quote an expression which is very common here. I have no doubt that it is enough. I have no very positive evidence, however, as to the exact number of dollars which is required for that purpose. But I vote against the proposition to reduce the sum contained in the bill, simply because $382,000,000 happens to be the number of dollars now in circulation, and I do not care to vote for any measure arbitrarily to reduce and contract that sum. I think, as I said at an earlier day in the session, that a law which shall contract the circulation positively is unjust to one class of our business men, the class which owe debts. Because $382,000,000 happens to be the sum now in circulation, I propose to acquiesce in that, without saying one word as to how that amount happened to get into circulation. And on the other hand I shall be compelled to vote against a proposition, let it come when it will or from whom it may, to increase the issue of legal-tender notes either to $400,000,000 or to any sum above that sum which is now outstanding.

Mr. President, if anybody had told me five years ago that I would live to hear in the Senate of the United States a proposition deliberately made and earnestly urged to increase the amount of legal-tender notes in time of profound peace, I should have said that whoever made that prediction was mistaken, that that time never would come. It is here, and I am told every day that a large portion of the people in that section of the country from which I come, it has even been said that a large portion of the people in the State which I have the honor to represent, are in favor of just that measure. If they are so, they never have told me so. They have left me to vote according to the dictates of my own judgment, and my own judgment is that they do not want any such measure as this adopted. If I am sure of anything in finance or in political economy, it is that their best interests do not require any such measure. And I wish to ask the Senate, first, suppose we agree to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue $18,000,000 more of these notes, what is he going to do with them? If you would instruct him to strike off that quantity of notes and allow us to distribute them as we distribute other public documents, the measure might have some attraction for even me, although I do not like myself the labor of distributing public documents. I am not sure, however, that I would not consent to take upon myself the distribution of my quota of that particular document, and not insist upon restoring the franking privilege to aid me in doing it. [Laughter.] But you probably do not mean that the Secretary shall distribute them in that way.

What will he do with the $18,000,000? It will not do you, nor myself, nor any constituent of mine any good to have those notes printed if they are to remain locked up in the Treasury. How will you get them out of the Treasury? What shall he buy with them? There are two ways, I suppose, in which he can get them out of the Treasury beside that of flinging them out of the window. You can if you please, and if you are very ingenious, contrive to reduce your revenue somewhat below the existing point, or you may, if you will sit up nights, increase your appropriations beyond what you now contemplate, and so create a market for your $18,000,000. He can have as good an excuse, as good an opportunity, to fling them in circulation as he found for the $26,000,000 which he has already thrown into circulation.

Mr. LOGAN. How was that?

Mr. HOWE. By precisely that process. You let your appropriations exceed your revenues. You left the Treasury with nothing else but dishonored due-bills with which to meet your appropriations, and he paid them out. Gentlemen, those most familiar with your financial legislation, have said here day after day that they did not suppose he was left with even that resource. But he found it; he found $44,000,000 of these notes in his vaults; the commercial metropolis came down on him and said "Pay them out;" he had nothing else with which to meet the liabilities of the Government, and so he paid them out. That is the way you got out $26,000,000, and you can by resorting to the same expedient get out the other $18,000,000.

Mr. SCHURZ. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir. I am always glad to hear a suggestion from the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SCHURZ. The suggestion I was about to make to the Senator from Wisconsin was this: first increase the currency, and then subsidies will be in order.

Mr. HOWE. O, Mr. President, then you will have means with which to subsidise all your steamships. Then you can build a great many public buildings, and you can do a great many handsome things if you have enough legal-tender notes in your Treasury that the people say they must have and that the Secretary can find no other way to get out of the Treasury.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to say a word in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri. He says subsidies will be in order. Now, I am in favor of $400,000,000 of legal-tenders and for an increase of the currency; but I would stay here as long as the Senator from Missouri before I would vote for a subsidy. There is nothing in that suggestion of his.

Mr. HOWE. I believe that is the case with my friend from Illinois, and I believe it is the case with every Senator here. You do not mean to subject this great country to the ineffable disgrace of allowing its appropriations to exceed its revenues merely for the purpose of inflating your circulation. You do not, any of you, mean to do that. So you will suggest some other expedient for getting these notes into circulation. What other expedients are there? Why, he must buy something with them, of course. What? You will not allow him to buy but one commodity, and that is your own interest-paying securities, bonds. That is a legitimate way of getting these notes out. You do not expect he is going to buy those bonds at the current rates to-day with $18,000,000 added to your circulation. No one expects that. You expect you are going to enhance the market value of all your interest-paying securities, by this very step of adding $18,000,000 to the circulation, so that every one of your bonds that the Secretary procures, he will procure at an enhanced price, just because of this inflation. No matter; you have contrived to get them out, and you think then you have relieved a public want. What public want? Whose want?

My friend from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] smiles rather incredulously. Who wants any more money? I guess my friend thinks I want it. Yes, upon one condition I want more money. If you will allow me to keep all the property I have got, what little I have got, and will not require me to do any more work, and upon those conditions will give me more money, I should think it a comfortable thing to have. But you may pack the vaults of your Treasury full to repletion, or you may make notes and exchange them for every interest-paying bond outstanding, and unless you and I have got the bonds to exchange for the notes, we have got to get them in some other way. The men will get the notes who now hold the bonds. I will not get any of them; I have got no bonds, and I cannot get any of them unless I will do another day's work in a month more than I now do, or unless I will sell something that I have got.

My friend from Michigan understands that very well. He would advise me to sell something. I want the money. Yes; but why sell anything I have got? When I have got the money what am I going to do with it? I cannot wear it, I cannot eat it, I cannot drink it. I can get better music than there is in your greenbacks out of a hand-organ on the streets. What can I do with it? What is it possible to do with it except to buy something else? Adding $18,000,000 to the circulation, you say I am enabled to sell some commodity that I have, and sell it at an advanced price. I dare say that is so; there is not a doubt about it. But when I come to expend my share of the notes that I get to buy any other commodity, do not I find that commodity enhanced just as much as the commodity I sold? I have the choice of property now. Anything I have got in the world I can sell at some price, and if I should think that with the money I could buy something else that I would rather have, I have only got to turn something that I have into that money, and with that money buy that other thing that I would rather have. That is the whole process. If the commodity that I want to put into the market is going to be enhanced by the addition of this $18,000,000, every commodity that I find in the market, and which I want to buy, is going to be enhanced just as much; is it not?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Your property is enhanced too.

Mr. HOWE. I say my property is going to be enhanced, but everything else is going to be enhanced in the same way. How, then, is it going to be of any advantage to me?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. It adds life to business.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, that is it; it does, just in this respect: it makes me count more money in payment for the property I sell, and then count the same amount more in the property I buy; it adds just so much life to business, and no more.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. It increases the pleasure of business.

Mr. HOWE. Yes; but I am so constituted that to work never was any pleasure to me in the world. [Laughter.] The less I do, the more satisfaction I get; and so I would rather count a little less when I buy and a little less when I sell, provided they have the same relations all the time, than to count a great deal on both occasions.

Sir, another class of men will feel this. There are a great many men in this country who have nothing to sell but service—labor. That is the only commodity they have to put in the market. They will get more for a day's work if you add this $18,000,000 to the circulation, will they not?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, I think they will get more; but what do they want with that more? Suppose they get a dollar a day now, and adding this $18,000,000 they get a dollar and a quarter a day; commodities are going to advance just as labor advances.

Mr. SCHURZ. Ahead of labor.

Mr. HOWE. My friend says ahead of labor. I cannot prove that, and therefore I will not assert that; but they will advance as much. I do not know whether he earns more than he expends or not, but I know that everything he earns he expends, and he will get no more for his dollar and a quarter than he gets for the dollar, because every other commodity advances just as much as his labor. I do not say more, but I say as much.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Where is the harm?

Mr. HOWE. I will tell you where I think the harm is. Every time you start your printing machines, you start them at some risk of an issue a little beyond that which your statute authorizes. As long as you print money you never will be dead sure of the quantity you are printing.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. They cannot be issued without the bonds.

Mr. HOWE. I have no idea that the Secretary will issue more millions of notes than he gets bonds. But what the printers may do—I know they are honest—but what they may do of course I do not know. Honesty makes mistakes; and if they should fling into the market a few dollars, or a few scores of dollars, or a few hundreds, or a few thousands, it would not be perceived by my friend from Michigan nor myself. That is one difficulty.

There is another little harm done I think. I am not a creditor, and I am not particularly anxious about creditors. I think in the long run they will take care of themselves. But the Senator must be aware of this, that there may be a class of men in the United States who want to sell property for the mere purpose of paying debts, who are more distressed about what they owe than about the value of the property they possess. The debts are already contracted. Now you add $18,000,000 to the circulation, and all those gentlemen are enabled to sell their property at an advanced price, and they have a specific thing to do with the money, to wit, to pay the debts they have already contracted. That is an advantage to the debtor, is it not? That will not be disputed. Is it not an injury to the creditor just as great? If it benefits one, does it not injure the other? And is it honest legislation? If I could see that it was, I might be induced to favor this measure; and not only favor an increase to $400,000,000, but why not to $800,000,000? Why stop at $400,000,000.

I do not want to dwell upon this point. It seems to me so plain, that after all I have heard during this long debate I cannot frame to myself an excuse for agreeing to this measure.

Sir, I have heard over and over again since this debate commenced that we have not had money enough in the country to do the business of the country. From the time this debate commenced down to now I have not heard adduced one single fact which tends to establish that proposition. We never should have had this long debate if it had not been for a very peculiar, a very extraordinary, and I think an unprecedented financial crisis through which we passed in September and October last; and I think gentlemen who have insisted upon an increase of the currency have very generally cited that crisis as conclusive evidence that we had not currency enough nor money enough, as they term it, to do the business of the country.

My deliberate judgment is that that crisis, if it proved anything, proved that we had and have an excess of circulation instead of a deficiency. Through the summer months, through the lax times of business and of activity, we know that money in its own markets was held very cheaply. The banks of Wisconsin, who redeem generally in Chicago, almost universally had a surplus, had unused currency. They sent it to Chicago, where they received a very low rate of interest for it. Chicago had no use for the money any more than the banks of Wisconsin had, and Chicago sent her surplus currency to New York, and it piled up in New York. We heard nothing about commercial or financial difficulties. On the night of the 17th of September the commercial and financial markets in New York City were undisturbed. Money was freely loaned at 7 per cent. On the 18th of September a great banking house failed. A house which had already spouted everything in the shape of an available security it had in trying to master a great, great enterprise; an enterprise which I am afraid was entered upon a good many years in advance of the business wants of the country—I say I am afraid so—closed its doors on the 18th of September. It alarmed New York. Three days after that I find in the New York Herald a brief statement of some of the many results of that failure, the effect it had upon the stock market; for I should have said that the legitimate business of New York had no more use for this piled-up circulation than there was for it in Chicago, in Illinois, in Michigan, or in Wisconsin. They agreed to pay a low rate of interest for it, and they wanted to make some use of it. There was but one use they could make of it, and that was to carry stocks, to loan it to the stock-brokers, and they did so. In the city of New York, on the 13th of October, the date when the first special report was made of the condition of the banks, there were no less than $56,000,000 outstanding in the shape of demand loans. Business men do not borrow money habitually payable on demand. Stock-brokers, stock-gamblers habitually do borrow it payable on demand.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator from Wisconsin has been kind enough to yield to me for a moment. I desire to illustrate what he has just said by reading an extract from a speech delivered by Mr. S. B. Chittenden at the recent meeting of the merchants of New York. He was speaking about the influence of an irredeemable currency in inciting speculation, and he told the following story:

A pet firm of brokers who went down in the crash were found to be in debt nearly $15,000,000. That firm had reorganized for business only a month or two before with a capital of one or two hundred thousand dollars; but it was able to borrow of banks and others, on stock held only for speculation, say $14,000,000. About the same time a commercial firm of more than ten years' standing, and having more than half a million of capital, applied to one of the largest national banks for the discount of $24,000 of business paper having less than thirty days to run, and were politely put off with one-half the amount asked for. The broker, for gamblers, got $14,000,000; the merchant, for honest business, got $12,000, or less than a thousand for a million. That is a true paper-money picture for you, true to life.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. If the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me a word at this point, the Senator from Missouri has indirectly and unconsciously verified the fact that has been presented here by the expansionists, that the accumulation of money in New York is more for speculation than for legitimate business, and therefore when reference is made to large accumulations there, we have stoutly contended that the money could not be drawn out of New York upon ordinary strictly business paper; in other words, gilt-edged paper. The Senator from Missouri, therefore, through the speech of the gentleman who addressed the meeting in New York, has confirmed what has been stated here, that the money accumulating there is for speculative purposes. We desire to distribute and diffuse this money throughout the West that it may be localized for business purposes.

Mr. HOWE. What makes money go from Michigan to New York on 4 per cent. when Michigan wants to pay 10? What makes money go from Wisconsin to New York and get into the hands of brokers there at 4 and 5 per cent. when Wisconsin wants it for 10? It goes there because Wisconsin does not want it, because Wisconsin does not propose to borrow it on anything satisfactory to her own banks.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Will the Senator allow me a word at that point?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. If there is anything in the Senator's argument it is that poverty prevails in Wisconsin. I live near Wisconsin, the State which the honorable Senator so ably represents, and I am hardly willing to reflect so much upon the financial standing of the citizens of Wisconsin. My key to the money flowing to New York would be that the Wisconsin bankers accumulating money deposited by depositors send it to New York to realize 4 per cent. interest upon it. One of the difficulties of the system is the payment of interest upon deposits. In order to realize that interest, they send the money there, when they should dicsount to their own people at home. In order to have it where they can draw upon it in case their depositors call for their money, they send it where they can get 4 per cent. interest upon it.

Mr. HOWE. I return heart-felt thanks to my honorable friend from Michigan for the honorable testimony which he has borne to the financial character of the citizens of Wisconsin. He has done them no more than justice. If I led him to suspect for a moment that I meant to represent them as poor, I did my constituents a great wrong, if not myself. No, Mr. President; I do not mean to introduce my constituents to the Senate as an illustration of a poverty-stricken people. They are rich. That money went to New York because Wisconsin was rich—understand the difference—because the people of Wisconsin were too intelligent to prefer money to property. They would rather have wheat; they had no use for money; they would rather have lumber; they would rather have land; they would rather have any one of these commodities which earns something every day than to have this money which they could not put into anything that would earn something. Why should they feel hungry or thirsty or naked simply because they had not a lot of handbills stuffed in their pockets?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Why did they not put their money in lumber this winter?

Mr HOWE. I take it, if they have not put their money into lumber this winter, it is because the men who make the lumber charge a little more for it than the men who use the lumber are willing to pay.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. If the Senator will allow me, on the question of lumber I am pretty well posted, and I doubt not the Senator is equally as well posted in his own State. I think the production of lumber from the stump to the saw in the State of Wisconsin during the past winter has been from one-third to one-half less than was produced a year ago. I know I have that to say for the State of Michigan, and I judge that the two States are acting alike; that the difficulties affect both States alike. If the Senator will state what is patent to him, because he understands pretty thoroughly all the interests of his State, he knows very well that from one-third to one-half less the amount of logs has been gotten out this last winter than the winter before.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know how that is; but I will concede, for the sake of this argument, that it is not one-fourth nor one-tenth. What does that prove? Simply that the lumber markets are not as hungry for lumber this year as they have been heretofore. What does that prove?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. But the Senator stated that they were so rich that they would rather put their money in lumber, and now the facts show that they do not put it in lumber.

Mr. HOWE. Well, I was not talking about this winter. I was simply saying they would rather have the property they had than to part with it and take your paper, or what you call money, for it. That is better than money; and any property is better than money.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Do they want to sell their wheat?

Mr. HOWE. Those who have a surplus of wheat usually want to sell it.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. What for?

Mr. HOWE. Because they want to get something else that they want more than wheat.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Will they not take money?

Mr. HOWE. They will when they can get money, which they would rather have than the wheat.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Do they have any trouble in disposing of it?

Mr. HOWE. I do not have any trouble in disposing of mine; and I did not when I had an increase of pay. I got rid of it all without the slightest difficulty. Increase my pay now, and I will undertake to do it again.

The great financial fact which is impressed upon my mind, but which does not seem to be impressed so clearly upon the mind of my honorable friend from Michigan, is this: I do not see any way of getting money without rendering something for it. If I am willing to give up something, and have got anything to give up, I can get it in that way. But if I am not willing to give something that I have got now, I never can get any more money, although you multiply it by the hundreds of millions.

I had forgotten where I was in this New York exposition. I think I had got along to the discovery that on the 13th of October the banks of New York had $56,000,000 outstanding payable on demand. Now, I do not think there were $10,000,000 so loaned by all the banks in the United States outside of New York. Does any one dispute me? Outside of the city of New York I do not think there were $10,000,000 so loaned. That is the way they stood on the 13th of October. This panic commenced, as I say, on the 18th of September. Three days afterward the Herald published this statement of the results of the crash upon the stock market, upon that property which was piled up as security for these $56,000,000. It is a little long, but let me read it; it is instructive:

The most emphatic commentary on the prevailing condition of affairs is the wonderful shrinkage of values, representing as it does fully $100,000,000—a sum which describes the terrible depletion that has been suffered by stock-brokers and their customers on the "long" side until reaction sets in and gives them a chance to make up their losses on an advance. The following table shows the extreme fluctuations for the week, in the leading shares:

In those three days $100,000,000 in values were wiped right out. But that was the very property which was spouted as security for this $56,000,000. Those loans were made upon a margin, as it is called. When these stocks fell off 10 per cent., the owners of the stock wanted 10 per cent. more. The banks could not very well afford to sell out these stocks, because they were going down, down, down.

Each succeeding day sent them down below the day before, so that many of the very bears who brought the crash upon them, and then turned around thinking they could lift them again by playing bulls, were crushed in the attempt. That was not a good time for the banks to undertake to call in their demand loans, and they dared not call them in. Of this $56,000,000 payable on demand on the 13th of October, on the 21st of November $51,000,000 were still outstanding. They dared not call them in. Of course such a state of things as that fell heavily upon the banks and they could not respond. At that very time the cotton from the South and the crops from the West wanted to get to market; the banks of Chicago, Cincinnati, and Saint Louis wanted their deposits in New York, and they began to check against them, to draw against them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It becomes the duty of the Chair to remind the Senate that the hour of four o'clock has arrived. The Senator is entitled to ten minutes under the understanding.

Mr. HOWE. Well, Mr. President, I did not mean to speak more than ten minutes when I rose, and if it had not been for the contributions of my friends around me, I would not have occupied more than ten minutes. I will try to close this branch of the subject, however.

They began to draw for their funds. At once New York said, "We cannot respond in currency; you must not ask the currency." Why? Because the currency was wanted to uphold these gambling operations in the city. As soon as the banks of New York informed the banks of Chicago and Cincinnati that they could not repay their deposits, the banks of Cincinnati and Chicago informed their country customers that they could not do it; they must not be drawn on for their deposits; and in eight-and-forty hours the circulation was congealed from the Atlantic to the Rocky Mountains—frozen up; and if the volume had been three times as great as it was, it would have been frozen to the bottom. So it seems to me that this little phenomenon last fall proves that there was a surplus, that there had been a surplus of circulation, that it was forced into illegitimate transactions, and so business had in a sense to stop or suffer because of it, at a later period, when there was legitimate use for it.

Mr. President, I have said that this was an unprecedented crisis. I do not mean that it was unprecedented in its severity merely, but in its character also. I have lived, young as I am, to see several of these financial crises. My friend from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] looks around startled; but it is a fact. I remember 1837, and that was a severe time. Then it happened, as it happened in 1857, and as it happened in 1861, the banks did not respond to their engagements. What were their engagements? To redeem their circulating notes in coin. They could not do that thing. They were not asked to do it last fall; but all through those seasons the banks were open and received deposits and paid them out. What they took from their customers they paid to their customers. Last September, for the first time in my recollection, the banks from one end of the country to the other said, "We cannot let our creditors have what they gave to us; we cannot repay our depositors." In that respect I think this crisis was peculiar, and was unprecedented.

But, Mr. President, I have occupied three times as much time as I intended. I have as well as I could stated the reasons which will prohibit my voting for an increase of the legal-tenders as is contemplated here. As I said in the outset, I shall vote against reducing it. The first section of the bill reported by the Committee on Finance is quite satisfactory to me. I may have something to say hereafter about some other sections of the bill which do not suit me as well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri on the left of the Chair, [Mr. SCHURZ.]

Mr. SHERMAN. The yeas and nays have been ordered on that amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON. Let the amendment be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is in section 1, line 4, to strike out "382," and insert "356;" so that the section will read:

That the maximum limit of United States notes is hereby fixed at $356,000,000, at which amount it shall remain until reduced as hereinafter provided.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I shall vote for this provision of the bill with some reluctance. I shall vote for it because $382,000,000 is the amount of circulation now out. I have no desire to determine by law whether it shall be more or whether it shall be less, to fix the greater or less amount. I do not understand how the Senate or any other body of men can determine whether $382,000,000 is a sufficient circulation, or whether it is too much; and it is on account of the limit, and I should have the same objection in regard to it whether the limit was greater or less. I do think the limiting of the currency in any manner which has been proposed is very objectionable.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The question, I believe, is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On that I desire to make a single observation as to the consideration which will control my vote. I shall vote for that proposition; and upon this understanding, that the legal-tenders were reduced after the action of Congress in 1865 from $433,000,000 to $356,000,000. I am not going into the various considerations which have induced Senators on the one side and the other to view it otherwise. We are directed for an interpretation of the act in some sense to the book-keeping of the Treasury. I hardly think that the Congress of the United States can rely upon the book-keeping of the Treasury Department for an authoritative exposition of a law, and therefore I do not feel concluded by that fact. I shall vote for the amendment on this general understanding, that in 1865 beyond all question the Congress of the United States, adopting the policy suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury, did intend to reduce the volume of the legal-tenders. Nobody denies that fact. That is a fact historically true. That was a fact recognized as a necessity by the Secretary of the Treasury, adopted by the House of Representatives, and again adopted by the Senate and the Congress, that it was worth while for the nation to begin to return to specie payments by a reduction of the volume of the greenbacks, which stood then at $433,000,000.

Now let us see how the Treasury Department regarded that. Let us see how it published that fact to the country. Let us see how we have since always understood it; how the legal-tenders stand in the account which the Secretary of the Treasury has kept with the country. The Secretary, in reporting the indebtedness of the country in 1865, puts down as an indebtedness, "United States notes, legal-tenders, $433,163,000." That was a debt, so much to be paid, and the United States was indebted to the holders of those notes.

Now, sir, come down to 1868, the period when Congress by its action said that the volume of legal-tenders should no longer be reduced, and how do you find it? What did the Secretary tell us then was the indebtedness of the United States for legal-tenders? In 1868 the Secretary of the Treasury tells us that the United States is indebted "for United States notes, $356,000,000." What had become of the difference between the $433,000,000 due in 1865 and the $356,000,000 only which were due in 1868? It is said they had been retired, not paid, not extinguished; that they lay in the reserve fund of the Treasury Department liable to be issued at any time, and that the liability of the Government of the United States was just as great as it was before they had been retired. What was the sense, then, of saying that the debt of the United States had been reduced $77,000,000? Was there any sense in such a report as that? Did the Secretary of the Treasury undertake to tell the country that he had absolutely paid off the debt of the United States by $77,000,000 between 1865 and 1868, when as matter of fact he had only carried it upon the cash-book of the Treasury Department, and might reissue it any day he saw fit? Of course not. And nothing is more conclusive than the fact which has recently transpired, that the present Secretary of the Treasury following very properly the precedents of his predecessors, feeling himself constrained by the exigencies of the occasion to resort to what has been denominated the reserve fund, has issued some $26,000,000, and what? Added so much to the public debt thereby.

Now, Mr. President, I say according to my understanding of the policy of the Secretary of the Treasury, commencing in 1865, adopted by Congress, we did begin to reduce the public debt by paying it, and I do not understand that by that the volume of the legal-tenders which lies this side of $400,000,000 was not paid. Being paid, it was extinguished. I shall vote, therefore, as an expression of my own convictions upon the subject, for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, which I suppose will not carry. If it should not, I shall then vote for confirming the action of the Secretary of the Treasury, who has followed the precedent of his predecessors, by legalizing the issues which have been made under the exigencies to which I have referred. If this amendment shall not carry, then I shall vote for the first section of this bill, which in itself would be legalizing the action of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. President, I am not going over the ground which has been occupied. I content myself with this statement.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, notwithstanding the pressure, I have stood here in obedience to the dictates of my own mature judgment to resist what I considered a dangerous and disastrous inflation of the currency; but I begin to believe that those who are opposed to inflation are falling off one by one, and I cannot but remember some words in the book of Job where he reproaches his friends, which it seems to me may be pertinently read:

My brethren have dealt deceitfully as a brook, and as the stream of brooks they pass away;
Which are blackish by reason of the ice, and wherein the snow is hid:
What time they wax warm, they vanish: when it is hot, they are consumed out of their place.

And so, sir, when it has waxed hot under the eloquence of my friends from Indiana and Illinois and Michigan, first the Committee on Finance vanishes out of its place, and abandons the theory that there should be no inflation; and now my friend from Wisconsin who has spoken this afternoon [Mr. HOWE] has vanished out of his place, too, and after him our venerable and ever-respected friend from Connecticut, [Mr. BUCKINGHAM.] One by one "they are consumed out of their place," and agree to go for a moderate increase of the currency. Well, Mr. President, I do not know but that this might justify me, a mere sergeant or private soldier, if I should say that as all the leaders have abandoned the flag, I too might not stand up in its defense. But there are other reasons that are somewhat stronger than this.

In the first place, no one supposes that the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] can carry, or that if it could carry in the Senate it would pass the other House; and I suppose without impropriety I may say that, since the other House has spoken its mind.

Then again, Mr. President, the fact alluded to by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Connecticut is not without its weight. The question is not, shall we, the currency being but $356,000,000, increase to $382,000,000; but it is, shall we, the outstanding currency being $382,000,000 in point of fact, reduce it to $356,000,000? That is, shall we contract? No man believes more firmly than I do that the Secretary of the Treasury misunderstood the law when he issued this $27,000,000. I never have seen a legal question upon which my mind was clearer than that. I do not question his motives; I do not question the necessity under which he acted; but, as a mere legal question, I never have seen one that seemed to me clearer; but he had this to be said in his defense: that when that thing was done one or two years ago Congress suffered it to pass without any rebuke. Then was the time for Congress to have interposed, when five millions were issued of that $44,000,000 miscalled a reserve, nicknamed a reserve, that never was a reserve, that the law never contemplated or dealt with as a reserve. When those five millions were paid out in violation of the law, then was the time for Congress to have interposed and have said, "This thing is in violation of law and shall be done no further;" but with the knowledge that it was done, and with the declaration of the then Secretary of the Treasury that in case of necessity he would do it again, Congress held its peace; and under these circumstances I am not much disposed to condemn the Secretary of the Treasury who followed the example set by his predecessor. At all events, with that example before him and with the silence of Congress before him, he has paid out twenty-six millions of those forty-four millions and they have gone into the business of the country and have affected it more or less. That being the case, and it being perfectly apparent that we cannot get back to the three hundred and fifty-six millions, I see no advantage to be obtained in the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, no chance of its being carried; and I think that the opponents of inflation had better rally all together in support of the sum reported by the Committee on Finance in the first section of the bill.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Mr. President, I have but a single word to say. I think upon this question, as upon all other questions, it is best to vote in accordance with what one believes to be the correct principle. I can under no circumstances vote for an expansion of the currency, and by that I mean an expansion of the legally authorized currency; and the amount of the legally authorized currency of the United States Government at the present day of irredeemable paper is $356,000,000. I vote therefore for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] because I would change the bill so as to have the amount outstanding in accordance with what is the legally authorized currency until such time as we can get rid of an irredeemable currency altogether.

In my judgment, the great mistake was made in the beginning, in 1862, when, under the pressure of what seemed then a great necessity, an irredeemable paper currency was issued at all. I think it never should have been issued; and experience now proves that to be true; and that now, when there is no pretense of necessity, for the Government of the United States deliberately to authorize an increase of irredeemable paper currency is to dishonor the nation at home and abroad, to open the flood-gates which no man can shut; and which will inevitably be followed, even from the little beginnings set in the first section of this bill, by further issues, until this nation shall have gone the round of the older nations of the world through issues unbounded of irredeemable paper, landing in universal bankruptcy, and compelling the nation to begin again on the sound rock of a currency based on gold and silver.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I do not suppose I differ very materially from my colleague. The question is what is the amount of currency now legally authorized; what is the amount now legally in circulation? My judgment is that there are outstanding against the Government of the United States $382,000,000; and if I vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, by which I substantially vote to let that section of the bill remain as it is, I vote neither to expand nor diminish the amount of currency in circulation; and therefore I cannot be chargeable, it appears to me, with any change of principle or action as suggested by my honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] But whether it be so or not, it is a fact that we have a certain amount of money in circulation. Suppose we refuse to-day to recognize the fact, does it change the obligation of the Government? Not at all.

It may or it may not be remembered that early in the session I introduced a resolution which was sent to the Finance Committee, instructing that committee to inquire whether it was not expedient to make temporary loans in order to cancel an amount of currency equal to that which had been issued by the Secretary of the Treasury since September 25, if that was the date. I was sure these temporary loans could be made by the Government at a low rate of interest for the purpose of canceling an amount of currency equal to that which had been issued. I believe a report which would have made that suggestion would have been a right and proper one; and if that committee shall bring it forward to-day, I will sustain it by my voice and by every vote.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will my friend permit me to ask him if there is any difficulty, if we vote that the currency shall be only $356,000,000, in our afterwards funding the $26,000,000 over that now out?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I do not understand the question.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If we say that the United States currency shall not be more than $356,000,000, according to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, is there any difficulty in our afterward funding the $26,000,000?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. None at all; but if you say that the currency shall be but $356,000,000 you say that which is not true, as it is $382,000,000 as a matter of fact. Now, I submit to the Senator from New Jersey, if you say by this act that the currency shall not exceed $382,000,000, is there any difficulty in passing an act to reduce it to $356,000,000?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But I submit to my friend that that would be a very strange way of legislating. Now it is contended that $356,000,000 is the legitimate sum. If so, it would be strange legislation for us to increase it $26,000,000, because we have the power afterward to reduce it. I think the logical way would be to keep it $356,000,000, and then by an act make provision to fund the $26,000,000 excess.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I differ entirely as to the process by which I would come to the same result. I think, as a matter of fact, we have a certain quantity of currency out, and it is not right or proper for Congress to repudiate and say that any part of that currency is an obligation not binding upon the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BOREMAN in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] to strike out $382,000,000 and insert $356,000,000 in the first section of the bill, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DENNIS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, Mr. STOCKTON, who has been called home on account of sickness in his family. If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. FLANAGAN, (when his name was called.) I agreed to pair with the Senator from Tennessee, Mr. BROWNLOW. If he were here he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONES, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas, Mr. DORSEY. Were he present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. KELLY, (when his name was called.) A few weeks ago I agreed with the Senator from Arkansas, Mr. CLAYTON, that I would pair with him for two weeks. That time expires to-day, and therefore I shall not vote. If he were present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea," on this question.

Mr. WRIGHT, (when his name was called.) I have just this moment had brought to my mind the fact that I agreed to pair with the Senator from Vermont, Mr. EDMUNDS, on this question. If he were present he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 40; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, and Stewart—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, Thurman, Tipton, West, and Windom—40.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Flanagan, Gilbert, Jones, Kelly, Stockton, Wadleigh, and Wright—14.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Let that amendment be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the first section of the bill, and to insert in lieu thereof:

That the amount of United States notes for circulation is hereby fixed at $400,000,000.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suppose the rule adopted by the Senate does not require that each Senator shall speak ten minutes. I have no disposition to take up time. I trust we shall have a vote at once on this amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move to amend the amendment by inserting at the end thereof—

At which amount it shall remain until reduced as hereinafter provided.

Of course, it will be understood that if the amendment in its naked form as proposed by the Senator from Iowa shall be adopted, it destroys the symmetry of the bill, and it contemplates not only $400,000,000 of United States notes, but it contemplates that that amount shall not be reduced and may be increased.

Mr. WRIGHT. I can conceive no reason why the Senator from Vermont should offer his amendment at this time. Of course if my amendment shall be carried it will be taken unquestionably as the sense of the Senate upon the general question that we want to arrive at this afternoon; and if it shall occur hereafter that the fourth section shall be retained in the bill, then no one probably would object to the amendment he proposes; but I prefer that the Senate shall come to a direct vote on the simple question that I present in this amendment and without reference to any other part of the bill. It is a question that we have discussed here for the last four months, and

I think that in view of what has been the unquestioned legislation of Congress, in view of what has been its failure to legislate, in view of the fact that it has failed to legislate when it was called upon to act on this question, and in view of the fact also that the Secretary of the Treasury has announced to us more than once that he was acting upon the hypothesis that he had a right to issue the $400,000,000, and that we failed to take any step to stop him, that point is squarely and fairly before us, I trust that the amendment of the Senator from Vermont will not be adopted at this time; but if the Senate shall adopt this amendment of mine and shall then retain the fourth section of the bill, the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont will then be in order. But at present I prefer that the only question should be before the Senate as to the $400,000,000.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Is the amendment proposed a substitute for the entire bill? I so understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For the first section only.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I presume the intention of the honorable Senator from Iowa is to fix a limit to circulation of this description. I suggest to him that in order to accomplish that he strike out the word "amount," and say instead "the maximum limit." If that is the wish of the Senator, I suggest to him that that language is more definite.

Mr. WRIGHT. I prefer to leave the language of my amendment as it is at present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to amend my amendment by inserting after the word "which" the word "maximum;" so as to read, "at which maximum amount it shall remain until reduced as hereinafter provided."

Mr. CONKLING. The purpose of the Senator from Vermont evidently is to improve an opportunity, which I am inclined to think may be the only one he will have, to guard against the danger which he has indicated. The pending motion is to strike out this section, and in lieu of it to insert another; and if we vote in favor of the motion as presented, and the Senator from Vermont then offers, as he is now invited by my friend from Iowa to offer, his amendment, I rather think he will encounter, among other things, a point of order insisting that when we have stricken out and inserted, it will not be competent to put back a part of that which we have stricken out. For this reason alone, I think the Senator from Vermont is quite opportune, and by no means hasty in presenting his point. At some time, certainly, it should be presented, because, I take it, nobody is so simple as to misunderstand what we have now heard.

First, an objection is made to accepting the word "limit" as it stands in the bill, and Senators are heard to exclaim that they prefer the word "amount." Next, a refusal is heard to adopting the words "at which amount it shall remain until reduced, as hereinafter provided." Who can mistake the meaning of these refusals? Nobody, it seems to me. It is plain to my mind that Senators favoring the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, and resisting that proposed by the Senator from Vermont, mean in substance this: that we shall declare $400,000,000 to be the amount of legal-tenders, not the limit, not the maximum, not the boundary, but the amount with a loose swinging result. Then the subsequent sections of this bill, section by section, are to run the gauntlet of the Senate; and the same majority which refuses to accept "limit" in lieu of "amount," the same majority which refuses to accept the words "at which amount it shall remain until reduced, as hereinafter provided," would be only logical if they struck out the subsequent provision of the bill which provides for a retirement down to $300,000,000. So that the meaning of all this, as I interpret it, plainly written out, is that the purpose exists now not only to sanction, to recognize and maintain a volume of legal-tender currency up to four hundred million, but to resist any provisions which shall look even ultimately to the curtailment of that volume. Therefore, if we are to resist this at all, we are to resist it upon the threshold; the time is now; and the Senator from Vermont is right in the occasion, and the mode he selects to ascertain whether it be the purpose of a majority here not merely to say that four hundred million is out, not merely to say that four hundred million shall be kept out, but to say also that any measure shall be voted down, be it in this bill or another, which looks at any time, within the discernible future at least, to the curtailment of that currency.

I am not going at present, Mr. President, to make any extended remarks. I shall succeed sufficiently if I am able to apprise the Senate that, for one, I do not mistake or fail at all to discern, in this single point which we now confront, the purpose lying behind it.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. As I understood the Senator from New York, he thinks it would not be competent for the Senate, if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa were adopted, to strike out a portion of those words and insert others that change the sense entirely. The adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, in the opinion of the Senator from New York, will preclude the possibility of striking out the word "amount" and inserting "maximum limit," or other words, such as are proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. CONKLING. No. My friend misapprehended me twice over. First, I made no allegation touching the point which he now states. Second, I affirmed nothing with regard to the point of which I did speak. I merely said that after a motion shall prevail, like that now pending, to strike out and insert, a point of order would be made; a parliamentary question would be raised probably. I did not undertake to predict the fate of that question, but simply to call the attention of the Senator from Vermont and of the Senate to the fact that we might be met by a parliamentary question; not that I say the parliamentary law would be that there is no mode of getting at it. My purpose was sufficiently answered by adverting to the fact that we should encounter the question. How the Chair might rule that question I did not undertake to say.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I shall have accomplished my object by calling the attention of the Senate to the incorrectness of an inference that might be drawn from the statement made by the Senator from New York that it would be impossible after the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont. In my judgment as a Senator, I believe that it would be competent. Inasmuch as the case cannot be made before the occasion arises for the Chair to rule, I merely call attention to it.

Mr. CONKLING. Allow me to ask my friend, what, then, is the objection to voting upon the amendment now?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Simply because a motion is made by the Senator from Iowa, and he prefers that form of the motion, and as far as I am concerned I am disposed to vote under the present form. I shall then be prepared, after its adoption or rejection, to adopt any other amendment if it shall appear to me just and proper.

Mr. CONKLING. Then we are to understand the Senator from Michigan that he puts it upon the ground of the mere personal taste and preference of the Senator from Iowa; that he sees no reason in substance, but merely that the mover of the original amendment expresses a preference that it shall be voted upon first; and, therefore, he thinks this amendment ought not to be made to it.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I did not rise for that purpose. I rose to dispel the impression left upon the Senate when the Senator from New York referred to the Senator from Vermont, and stated that now was his last opportunity, that if the amendment was adopted as offered by the Senator from Iowa there would be no possibility of offering or accepting the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont. All I wished was to dispel that impression which had been left on the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator has not succeeded in dispelling the impression on me that we shall be stranded perhaps upon a point of order if we do not consider the amendment of the Senator from Vermont now; and the Senator from Michigan has confirmed an impression which I forbore to declare a moment ago, but which I will now frankly state. He has confirmed a suspicion in my mind that the purpose is, when the proper point in this bill is reached, to move to strike out everything touching banking except that which will inaugurate banking absolutely free without any retirement of greenbacks and without any redemption. Unless that be the purpose, unless the design be to change or to attempt to change the bill in that respect, I undertake to say there is no reason of substance or even of preference for not voting first upon the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORTON. The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa is intended as a substitute for the first section. Now I will ask to have the amendment to that substitute, offered by the Senator from Vermont, read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The words proposed to be added are as follows:

At which maximum amount it shall remain until reduced as hereinafter provided.

Mr. MORTON. The adoption of that amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont commits us by implication to the adoption of the rest of the bill. That amendment is that the currency of United States notes shall stand at $400,000,000 until reduced as hereinafter provided in this bill. If that be the purpose of the amendment, I am sure nobody wants to vote for it unless he is prepared to vote for what follows in the bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. May I ask a question of the Senator from Indiana? He is a frank man. He does not desire to do anything indirectly, or anything that he is not willing to avow. Now, I ask him if it is not his purpose in sustaining the substitute proposed by the Senator from Iowa, then to sustain entirely free banking at the end of the bill?

Mr. MORTON. I will come to that when the amendment is offered. But to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont is by implication to indorse what stands in the bill now.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. Suppose that the amendment of the Senator from Vermont shall be adopted, it is then that the greenbacks shall stand at $400,000,000 until reduced as hereinafter provided in this bill; but what shall be hereinafter provided in the bill will depend upon our action on the remaining parts of the bill. It is no committal to anything.

Mr. MORTON. It is a committal, and a direct committal. But now I come to the other point. Suppose we vote down the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, and then in a subsequent provision of the bill we do provide in some form, either in the mode provided now, or some new one, for reducing the $400,000,000 to $300,000,000, or $200,000,000, is not that competent; and would that subsequent provision be any less effective because these words proposed by the Senator from Vermont are not put in? It still leaves it entirely competent for the Senate to put in a provision disposing of the $400,000,000 in part or in whole, although these words are not put in there; but the adoption of these words is in substance an adoption of what follows in the bill on that subject.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I do not propose to enter into the discussion at all. I rise only to make an appeal to my friend from Vermont, to ask him to modify his motion. If I have understood his motion, he has proposed to add these words, "at which maximum amount it shall remain until reduced as hereinafter provided." I ask him to withdraw the word "maximum," and I will state very frankly why I do it. Although I think I agree with the Senator from Michigan that if the Senate do strike out those words with other words we might, by a separate motion, vote back a part of the words stricken out; but that is doubtful. If, however, the Senator from Vermont will modify his amendment, and leave out the word "maximum," and then it shall be necessary to move it subsequently with that word "maximum" in, it will be a different thing from the words stricken out; and thus we shall remove all questions upon a point of order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Maine, and withdraw the word "maximum."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be so modified.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the important consequences that may flow from the adoption of the amendment. My friend from Iowa has not selected the particular language used by him without a purpose. He is too good a lawyer for that. If he wanted to raise the simple question of whether the maximum limit of our United States notes shall be as formerly $400,000,000, all he had to do was to move to strike out $382,000,000 and insert $400,000,000; but let me tell him the consequences now of this motion. He strikes out the words "maximum limit," so that hereafter the law of 1866, which fixes the maximum at $400,000,000, is practically repealed. I have carefully studied the language, and I assure the Senator that if that language is adopted it revives the reserve provided for by the act of 1864. The amount of United States notes "for circulation" is fixed at $400,000,000, restoring again the reserve of $50,000,000 to be used at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and repealing the limitation provided by the act of 1864 and renewed by the act of 1865, which says that never shall the amount of United States notes exceed $400,000,000. It is perfectly manifest, and Senators ought to confess that that was their intention, that this amendment goes far beyond the purpose announced. If the Senator (as I hope he does, for the present, at least) simply desires to ascertain the sense of the Senate as to whether the maximum limit of United States notes shall be $400,000,000 instead of $382,000,000, let him make that motion; and then if hereafter the fourth section of the bill is stricken out, he can easily move to strike out the words which now form the burden of dispute between him and the Senator from Vermont.

But, sir, if it is proclaimed in this Senate to-night that it is the purpose of the Senate of the United States to break down the barrier that has been made which has for long years fixed the maximum limit of United States circulation at $400,000,000, you will create alarm. I trust, therefore, that if we are to meet this matter, as I hope we shall, frankly and fairly, the Senator will take the sense of the Senate now on the mere question of $400,000,000, leaving the language of the section as it now stands, which is but a copy of the language of the former law; but the change of language, especially so peculiar a change, being the substitution of language which removes all maximum limits and opens at once a reserve of $50,000,000 and practically repeals all the restraints upon an increase of United States notes, would create alarm.

I have called attention to the fact that the words "for circulation" are put in. Why? Those very words, in connection with the other words, show clearly that the $400,000,000 without any maximum is for circulation, and the $50,000,000 is for reserve, and as many more millions as can be voted for in any other way to meet exigencies of the Government.

Mr. MORTON. The suggestion of the Senator from Ohio is clearly a non sequitur. Between this language proposed by the Senator from Iowa and the old $50,000,000 reserve there can be no possible connection. I hope nobody will be frightened by it. When it is proposed that the amount of these notes for circulation shall be $400,000,000, the Senator says that means $450,000,000. No such thing. It means just what it says.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I ask the Senator, why not simply take the proposition as reported and move to change the amount?

Mr. MORTON. I think the Senator from Iowa has a right to propose his amendment in his own form and his own way, without having it dictated to him by anybody else.

Mr. WRIGHT. Unquestionably so; and if any member of the Senate sees proper to offer an amendment he can raise the question. I offer this amendment, and I am sure that it is not subject to the objection that is suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Finance. It is in effect precisely what he says. Now he asks why did I not move to strike out $382,000,000 in the bill and insert $400,000,000? For the reason that I wanted to get rid of the remaining portion of the section, of the language that is now sought to be put upon my amendment by the Senator from Vermont. I proposed a substitute for this section for the purpose of getting the question fairly before the Senate, and I think that question is fairly presented here. If the Senator from Ohio thinks that the word "maximum" ought to be inserted before the word "amount," he can move such an amendment; but I have selected the language that I have moved as a substitute for this section. Now I appeal to those who think that we ought to have a circulation of $400,000,000, or who think that the maximum ought to be $400,000,000, (and that is what it means and nothing more,) to stand by the amendment as it is. If the Senator from Ohio sees proper to offer an amendment to it, inserting the word "maximum," and the Senate so determine, that is the sense of the Senate.

Mr. SCHURZ. I would ask the Senator from Iowa whether it is his intention that $400,000,000 should be the maximum amount of United States notes?

Mr. WRIGHT. Unquestionably so.

Mr. SCHURZ. Is it his intention that there should be a reserve in the Treasury besides that?

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly not.

Mr. SCHURZ. Then why not say so?

Mr. WRIGHT. If the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Ohio think that my language does not accomplish the object, let them offer any amendment. I say it does accomplish the purpose as it is now. If they think it does not, let them take the sense of the Senate by offering amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot offer any now, because it is not in order.

Mr. WRIGHT. There will be a proper time when the Senator can offer it.

Mr. CONKLING. Is any part of my ten minutes still at my disposal?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Five minutes.

Mr. CONKLING. Then, I have to say that nothing since I have been in the Senate has ever occurred equal to this, in my opinion, except once, and that was when, upon very much such arguments, we could not put in the act of 1868 the words "or increased," because the clause would mean the same thing without them and they were not necessary; and the Senator from Indiana has duplicated very well one of the speeches that he made on that occasion. He says this amendment means the same thing as the proposed modification would declare, and the Senator from Iowa has a right to offer his amendment in any language he pleases. Undoubtedly he has a right to consult the most fastidious taste in all the dots of the i's and the crosses of the t's; but I hope this Senate will not be so far hoodwinked as not to see the difference and the designed difference between a "maximum limit" and an "amount for circulation," words which had entirely escaped me until I went down to the desk and looked upon them. After hearing the Senator from Iowa admit that he wants to discard the residue of this section, after knowing that he has carefully picked and chosen words to distinguish and discriminate between those words and the definition given to the language already standing in the statutes, does any man now suppose that it is a mere matter of style, a mere matter of rhetoric, a mere piece of phrase-mongering which leads the Senator from Iowa to import into this amendment the words "for circulation?" I apprehend not. As the Senator from Ohio says, if they mean anything, they mean to go beyond, to jump over, to pass by all legal-tenders known as reserve, and to begin to count when circulation counts as such, irrespective of reserve. If they do not mean that, for what is the Senator from Iowa contending? A phrase? O no, Mr. President. The Senator from Iowa has no time to waste in that way. He goes for things, and not for words; and this language, if it be preferable for any reason to the language already inscribed on the statute-book, known and construed, is valuable because it means something more than that; and if it means more than that, it means more of circulation.

Now, Mr. President, I hope that no Senator will allow the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to pass him by without giving to it that attention due to the fact that it may be the only opportunity to guard against that of which I am speaking. Some Senator on my right said in his seat, the Senator from Iowa, perhaps, that the Senator from Vermont could offer it afterward. No, sir; he cannot offer it afterward, under the rules of the Senate; at least not in Committee of the Whole, nor even in the Senate as he proposes it. It is now or never. If we mean to cut loose from all settled ideas and rise upon the wings of unbridled inflation, so be it; but let us have courage enough to stand up to it, to say what we mean, and hew to the line no matter where the chips fly. If we do not mean that, do not let us put in a juggling phrase by which another fifty or twenty-six millions shall go out, and when we turn back to the record find no reason for it except that some Senator said, "It is not necessary to guard against that; there is no doubt as to the meaning; it is not worth while to amend; the Senator from Iowa is entitled to choose his own language; he has chosen it; let it be like the laws of the Medes and Persians, without alteration."

Mr. MORTON. Have I any time left, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Two minutes and a half.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, we have the ghost of the reserve conjured up here to-night. Nobody has argued in the Senate, it has not been contended by the Secretary of the Treasury, that the fifty million reserve, making four hundred and fifty millions of United States notes, may be issued under the law as it now stands. That was for temporary loans which have been paid off. That it now exists, I believe has been contended for by nobody; but now that is suddenly sprung here to affright the souls of Senators and make them depart from an amendment. The intimation is made that this has some deep and hidden meaning. I ask, on the other hand, what is the deep and hidden meaning couched under the language that is insisted upon? So far as I am concerned I will not undertake to suggest to the Senator from Iowa; but if the word "maximum" was inserted before the word "amount" in his substitute, I should have no objection; but this idea of reviving the fifty million reserve, a thing that nobody has contended for here in debate and that no Secretary has contended for in the last few years that I have heard of, seems to me to be preposterous.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of my friend from Vermont, and of all other Senators who have been watching this thing closely, to the fact that his amendment alone will not answer the purpose. The dangerous words in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa are the words "for circulation;" and now if the amendment of the Senator from Vermont were adopted, it would not cure that vice one particle.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If this amendment of mine shall be adopted, I propose then to move to strike out those words.

Mr. THURMAN. What I was going to suggest to the Senator, was to withdraw his amendment for the present, and move to strike out those words. Nor can it be of the slightest advantage to insert the word "maximum" before the word "amount," in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, if you leave the words "for circulation" in. The only way to get at this matter, and to prevent a circulation of $400,000,000 in addition to the reserve, is to strike out these words "for circulation." I therefore hope the Senator from Vermont will move to strike out those words. He can do it after his amendment has been voted on, or before; but I think it would be better, and he would have more strength, if he would withdraw his present amendment, and move, instead of it, to strike out the words "for circulation." Then he can afterward renew the amendment which is now pending.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I prefer to have the present motion voted on first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. MORTON called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Several SENATORS. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the amendment of Mr. WRIGHT the words:

At which amount it shall remain until reduced as hereinafter provided.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not expect to say one word during this whole voting; but those who have been in favor of $400,000,000 have kept perfectly silent now for two days. An unexpected raid, however, has been made here within the last few minutes, for a purpose. I say that inasmuch as the words "for a purpose" have been used in reference to the amendment of my friend from Iowa, as if to insinuate that gentlemen had something covered up in the amendment, I desire to make a remark in reference to that proposition.

What does the proposition offered by the Senator from Vermont mean? As said by the Senator from Indiana, it means to indorse something that is to follow, and the Senator from New York stated if the amendment of the Senator from Iowa were once adopted no amendment could then be offered to it. Now, does the Senator from New York mean to say to the Senate that if the language of the amendment presented by the Senator from Iowa should be adopted no clause could be inserted in the following sections of the bill, either to contract or redeem the currency?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly not. I said no such thing.

Mr. LOGAN. I know you said no such thing, but I ask, did you mean that? For that was the clear inference, and that was the charge which was made here in the Senate for the purpose of alarming somebody, as though Senators were to be scared out of their wits and out of their votes in reference to these things. This was a suggestion such as is occasionally made by certain gentlemen when they expect to scare somebody.

Now, what does this amendment of my friend from Iowa mean? It means nothing more nor less than that $400,000,000 shall be the amount of United States circulating medium. Now, I ask you, if you make the maximum $400,000,000 without a proposition that a portion of it shall be kept in reserve, does not that mean that it is to be in circulation? This word "circulation" means nothing more than your language when you say the maximum amount shall be $400,000,000, unless you provide for a reserve of a portion of it. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] says that this revives the law fixing a reserve of $50,000,000. I will not say that he knows better, but I will say that that is such a proposition as it strikes me no intelligent man would believe for a moment. It means no such thing, and by no possible thing could it have any such effect. This means nothing more nor less than to say that the amount of United States notes hereafter shall be $400,000,000. Why? Because there has been a controversy for some years as to the amount of United States notes authorized. Some say $356,000,000, some say $382,000,000, others say $400,000,000. Four hundred millions was the amount fixed by law until the $44,000,000 was contracted by Secretary McCulloch, and this means nothing more than to allow that $44,000,000 to go into circulation at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury. It means nothing more, and it cannot mean anything else.

There is no use in our trying to alarm one another in this Senate, because the presumption is that every Senator has sense enough to judge for himself as to how he shall vote. Whether this be a violent one or not, is not for me to say; but I should infer from the language of my friend from New York that there was a portion of us here who did not understand ourselves; and he proposes to alarm us as to that which we cannot understand, to scare us for fear there was something in this that we do not see. I think I understand this question about as well as the Senator does; and I am not frightened when he makes his attack in such a manner as though he was charging at the head of some column and bearing down some enemy and trampling him under foot; and no doubt his long silence on this question has left him sufficient strength to lead a charging column here in the Senate for the purpose of striking down some of the rest that perhaps are a little weakened by the amount of talking they have been doing.

Now, I say if the proposition of the Senator from Iowa is not in accordance with the views of these gentlemen, if they have a majority in the Senate, let them shape it according to their views; but if the majority is against them when the vote is taken, at least permit that majority to choose their own language. I do not know how the majority stands; I cannot tell. I do not know whether this amendment will be voted up or down; but if voted up, if adopted, and the language which is suggested by the Senator from Ohio, or by the Senator from New York, is more desirable, either one of them can move it and have it put in, and well you know that.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not.

Mr. LOGAN. You do not! Then you have a weakness that I did not discover before. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators should address the Chair.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not think there is any man in the Senate who does not know the fact to be that if the amendment be adopted it can be amended afterward.

Mr. HAMLIN. O, no!

Mr. LOGAN. I have read the rules. What I mean is that the language following can operate to restrict it, to contract it, or in any other form you choose you can get at it. Is not that true?

Mr. SHERMAN. You may add new words, but you cannot strike out.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not speaking of striking out; but can you not insert the word "maximum" in front of "amount?"

Mr. SHERMAN. But after the words "for circulation" are adopted you cannot strike them out.

Mr. LOGAN. I will ask, then, if you adopt the proposition just as the Senator from Ohio reported it, leaving it at $382,000,000, does that not mean that notes to that amount shall be in circulation?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. What are they for, if not for that?

Mr. LOGAN. If you adopt the words "four hundred million dollars," I ask the Senator to tell me what they mean. By providing for $400,000,000, do you mean that that amount shall not be in circulation? Do you mean to humbug the country by providing for $382,000,000, and then have it covered up so that that much shall not be in circulation? Is that the meaning? Why, sir, if you mean that the amount authorized shall be in circulation, say so; and that is what we mean. We mean that $400,000,000 of currency shall be the United States currency, and the amount that may be in circulation in this country. Now, if you do not mean that the $382,000,000 shall be in circulation, I would like to know what you try to impose on the Senate for; because that is our understanding of it. We say "circulation," we mean "circulation," because we want it for that purpose and not for a reserve. This wipes out the reserve, and makes the amount named the amount of the circulating medium of the United States. That is all it means; and if we do not mean to have it for circulation, what do we mean to put it in for? If we do not want it for circulation, what do we want any amount for? We might as well vote for the proposition of the Senator from Missouri to fix the maximum amount at $356,000,000, if we do not intend it shall be in circulation. We voted that down. Why? Because we wanted $400,000,000 of circulation; or, at least, some of us did so on that ground. I can conceive of no other meaning this proposition has except that, and for that reason I propose to vote for $400,000,000 of circulation. That is what I mean by my vote when I vote to fix the maximum amount at $400,000,000. If I mean it, why not say it?

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, the pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, to add to my amendment certain words. That is the question upon which we are now to vote. After the vote shall be taken upon that question and it shall be defeated, as I trust it will be, then the amendment offered by me will be in the possession of the Senate. If the amendment of the Senator from Vermont shall be defeated, I shall not then resist any proposition to insert the word "maximum," if it is deemed by the friends of the measure all around better to do so; but at present I call on the friends of this proposition to remember that we are now voting on the simple proposition of the Senator from Vermont to add these words. I trust they will be voted down, and then we shall have the amendment in our own hands.

Mr. MORRILL of Vermont. I do not propose to act as "the whip" of the Senate. I think the Senate are quite competent to express their own judgment without any whip. We have never had what is called a whip in the American Senate, and so far as I am concerned I do not offer any amendment to this bill for the purpose of mangling it. I am disposed to improve the bill. I do not expect that I shall be able to vote for it; but at the same time I desire to have it express fairly and properly the meaning on its face, and not have it conceal something that we do not understand. Now, if it is not the purpose of the Senator from Iowa to embark here in an increase of the circulation to the amount of $400,000,000, for the purpose of leaving open the question of unlimited free banking, then he can have no possible objection to the amendment which I propose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DENNIS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, Mr. STOCKTON. If present he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. JONES, (when his name was called.) I was induced a few days ago to pair with the Senator from Arkansas, Mr. DORSEY. It is impossible for me to say how he would vote on this proposition.

Mr. LOGAN. He would vote with us.

Mr. JONES. I cannot tell how he would vote, because this proposition is new, and has not been up before; but for fear that I may do some injustice to Mr. DORSEY, I will not vote upon it. I should vote "yea" if I felt at liberty to do so.

Mr. KELLY, (when his name was called.) As I stated before, I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas, Mr. CLAYTON. If present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. SCOTT, (when his name was called.) I consider myself paired on this question with my colleague, [Mr. CAMERON.] I would vote for this amendment, and I suppose he would vote, if present, against it.

Mr. WRIGHT, (when his name was called.) Upon this question, and upon all other questions connected with this bill, I may as well state, once for all, that I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, Mr. EDMUNDS. Exactly how he would vote on this special question I cannot say; but he told me to notice how his colleague voted, and his colleague would vote just as he would all the time. Therefore I shall not vote. I suppose he would vote for this proposition, and I should vote against it if at liberty to do so.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sherman, Stevenson, Stewart, Thurman, and Wadleigh—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Carpenter, Conover, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, West, and Windom—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Flanagan, Gilbert, Jones, Kelly, Scott, Stockton, and Wright—15.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "for circulation" and inserting in lieu of the word "amount" the words "maximum limit," and I appeal to the Senator from Iowa that as these are words that have been carefully studied, and the precise meaning and effect of which are distinctly known, have been considered in committee, and are copied from laws of long standing, he ought to concur in them. The words "for circulation" might create a very serious doubt under the second section of the act of June 30, 1864, entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," when the maximum limit, the total amount of United States notes for circulation was fixed at $400,000,000, and in addition to that there was a reserve provided for by the same section. I very much fear that the use of this language, so similar to that in the old law, would revive that reserve. I know he does not intend that. There is more argument in favor of that construction of the law than there ever was in favor of making the $44,000,000 a reserve. There is no law of the land which in terms even declared that the $44,000,000 should be a reserve; but there is now upon the statute-book a law which provides for a reserve of $50,000,000 for temporary liabilities.

It seems to me, unless the Senator really designs to open up the question of another increase of $50,000,000 more, he ought to remove all doubt on that subject by accepting my amendment which fixes the maximum limit of United States notes.

In reply to the observation of my friend from Illinois, I will say that as a matter of course these notes are intended to circulate under existing laws, but the words "for circulation" may renew the old distinction made between the $400,000,000 for circulation and the $50,000,000 which was for reserve.

Mr. LOGAN. Why not say "maximum amount" instead of "limit?"

Mr. SHERMAN. The word "limit" is better, I think.

Mr. LOGAN. No; I think "amount" is better.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the law of 1865 the language is "maximum limit." In others it is "total amount," which are words of equivalent meaning. "Maximum limit," I think, is the proper term here.

Mr. WRIGHT. I want now, once for all, to dispel any impression that I had any purpose whatever by the amendment as I proposed it to do anything except what has been suggested by the Senator from Ohio and other Senators on this floor. The language I selected was my own. I had no conception that any person could think for one moment that it could change existing laws, or could, by possibility, revive anything in connection with the fifty million reserve. I have no wish of that kind, and I am sure there is no Senator who has voted with me who has any wish of that kind. Now, for the purpose of getting the Senate to a direct vote on the question, I suggest to the Senator from Ohio, if he will allow me, that I am willing to modify my amendment so as to substitute for the pending section this language:

That the maximum amount of United States notes is hereby fixed at $400,000,000.

Mr. MORTON. That leaves out the words "for circulation." I have no objection to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only objection I have to the use of the word "amount" is that it does not still retain the word "limit," which is by two laws already declared. The law of 1865 and the law of 1864 speak of the "limit" beyond which United States notes shall not go.

Mr. WRIGHT. Can the Senator from Ohio by possibility point out any difference in meaning between the words "limit" and "amount?"

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not see any reason why the Senator should not adopt "limit."

Mr. WRIGHT. I have yielded so far as the words "for circulation" are concerned, and I propose now to stand by this amendment unless some person shall move to change it. I put it: "The maximum amount of United States notes is hereby fixed at $400,000,000."

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me the word "limit" is a word of limitation, while the word "amount" is not a word of limitation, but a word of description; and I think in language so important as this, in a law which is intended to prescribe a limit, the word "limit" ought to be used.

Mr. LOGAN. The words "maximum amount" are a limitation.

Mr. SCHURZ. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the pending amendment as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out the first section of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert:

That the maximum amount of United States notes is hereby fixed at $400,000,000.

Mr. SCHURZ. I move to amend it, if it is subject to amendment, by striking out the word "amount," and inserting "limit."

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator from Iowa, if he deems the word "amount" and the word "limit," as he has said, precisely synonymous when used here, why he does not take the word "limit," as that happens to be in the existing law?

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not think it makes any difference in the world, one way or the other, whether you insert "limit" or "amount;" but "amount" is the language I have elected.

Mr. CONKLING. Then why does not my friend insert the word "limit," if it is preferred by some Senators?

Mr. WRIGHT. For the reason that I understand this proposition comes from those who will not vote for the amendment under any circumstances.

Mr. CONKLING. Admitting that to be so, if it is the same in effect why does the Senator choose the other word?

Mr. WRIGHT. Does not the Senator know that very often a proposition is made by those who are opposed to your amendment, and that under any circumstances, you do not feel at liberty to accept the proposition?

Mr. CONKLING. If it is the very same thing?

Mr. WRIGHT. Does the Senator think it amounts to the same thing?

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Iowa says he thinks it does; and my question is, why he, so thinking, objects to the employment of the other word?

Mr. WRIGHT. I have already stated the reason.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend from Illinois is kind enough to say that he does not wish to do it so as to satisfy me.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not mean you.

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will pardon me a moment——

Mr. LOGAN. I will restate what I said in my seat, so that the Senator may not be mistaken. I merely said in a side-bar remark that the Senator from Iowa did not desire to fix it for the Senator from New York, but for himself. That was what I said.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, Mr. President, I will say what I rose to say. In one view the choice between the word "limit" and the word "amount" is a very critical choice, although the word "limit" is in the statutes, and has been construed and defined. In another sense, and in the sense in which I understand those words here, there is a very substantial choice, and in two respects which I will state.

In the first place, if you say that the maximum limit shall be $400,000,000, it means at once that the amount of those notes shall not be more than that, and it means that it may be less. If you fix it as a boundary by the word "limit," it means that the sum shall never pass that amount. It does not imply that the sum shall not fall below that limit. There is one distinction, and I think a very manifest distinction.

If you say that the maximum amount of notes is to be so much, one construction of it would be that that amount was to be kept out. But this distinction becomes much more obvious in this bill in connection with the subsequent sections. Section 4 provides that the amount shall be reduced until you reach $300,000,000. Now, does not everybody see that the symmetrical word in reference to that is "limit," so as to leave room for a diminution, and does not everybody see that when you employ the word "amount" you are speaking of a positive quantity, which is inconsistent with the idea that it is to be afterward reduced? That is very plain to me. If the subsequent section of the bill were to stand, it would amount merely to a criticism upon the choice of language. But if it should so happen when that amendment arises (which the Senator from Indiana has frankly told us he will express his position about when it comes up) that an amendment is offered to strike out section 4, I think it will be tolerably plain to all of us that there has been all the time a distinction between the word "limit" and the word "amount." Now, if we mean that $400,000,000 is to be kept out, "amount" is a very good word. If we mean that an uncertain sum is to be kept out which shall never exceed $400,000,000, then "limit" is the appropriate word; it is the term of art to express it; and it so happens in addition to that, that it is in the statutes now, has been defined, and is thoroughly understood.

In view of these two distinctions, I can hardly accept the idea, although the Senator from Iowa has announced that as to himself, and therefore I accept it as to him, that a majority of the Senate will refuse to take the defined, familiar word in the statutes, upon the idea that the meaning is precisely identical, neither more nor less, with the word "amount," but yet they will have the word "amount" because it stands in the amendment. I think that will be rather an insufficient argument to satisfy anybody.

Mr. MORTON. If there be any substantial difference between the words "maximum amount" and "maximum limit," I hope the Senator from Iowa will stand by his language. I say "if there be." The word "maximum" there, which means something beyond which you cannot go farther, has the same signification when standing before the word "amount" that it would have before the word "limit." I think it is Hudibras that talks about the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee. As far as the words are concerned, they are both found in numerous statutes. The word "amount" occurs very frequently in statutes and the word "limit" occurs; and they are both good words, good sound English words. The Senator from New York and other Senators will not vote for the amendment when they get that word "limit" put in, whatever object they may have. I suppose they would like to shape the amendment so as to defeat it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would suggest to the Senator from Iowa that he substitute the word "limited" for the word "fixed" in the fourth line, and that will please everybody. He holds on to the word "amount," and then says that "the maximum amount of United States notes is hereby limited to $400,000,000."

Mr. LOGAN. I do not think it is necessary to do that.

Mr. WRIGHT. My friend from New Jersey proposes to amend this by saying practically that the maximum amount of United States notes shall be fixed at such maximum amount.

Mr. LOGAN. We want decent language.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not know much about language; but I should like my friend to show me the indecency or impropriety of the language I have suggested.

Mr. LOGAN. The word "decent," perhaps, was not a good word; I should have said "proper."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CONKLING called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Several SENATORS. What is the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out the first section of the bill, and in lieu of the words stricken out to insert:

That the maximum amount of United States notes is hereby fixed at $400,000,000.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to ask one question of those who are more familiar than I am with these laws. This is not an act authorizing the issue of legal-tender notes; they must be authorized by some other act; and the object of the first section of this bill is to restrict the issue, if it has any object at all. Certainly it is not intended to be an affirmative grant of power to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue notes. Now what I wish to inquire, and I will inquire of my colleague, as he is familiar with the laws, what is the present existing provision of law as to the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue legal-tender notes. To what extent is he authorized to issue?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think he has issued $26,000,000 more than he is authorized by law to do; but he claims the power to issue up to $400,000,000.

Mr. THURMAN. Then the proposition of the Senator from Iowa is by implication to give him the power to issue $44,000,000 more than the law now authorizes him to issue as it stands. It is not a direct authority to issue it; but by saying that the amount is fixed at $400,000,000, I suppose by implication the Secretary of the Treasury is to be authorized to do that thing. It strikes me that it is an odd way of granting power to create currency in the country by tens and forties of millions. If the Senator intends to give him a power that is not already conferred by statute, let him give it in direct language and not in indirect language. We have had quite enough indirect language in this business. If the statutes now do not authorize him to issue $400,000,000, and the Senator thinks he ought to have that power, let him say so directly. If the statutes do authorize him to issue $400,000,000, if he has the right to reissue this $44,000,000 reserve, so called, then the sole office of this section must be to restrict it, and it ought to be plainly restricted in its language.

Mr. GORDON. I simply wish to ask, before the vote is taken, whether it will be in order to move to add the words which the Senator from Iowa agreed to strike out. I find that the House bill uses the words "in general circulation." Will it be in order to move that as an amendment after this vote shall be taken, if the amendment should be adopted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is in order now, if the Senator chooses to make it.

Mr. GORDON. I do not want to embarrass the vote now.

Mr. MORTON. I think it would be in order afterward, would it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. MORTON. To add to?

Mr. GORDON. I regret that the Senator from Iowa has withdrawn those words, as the amendment as he had it originally was in exact conformity with the House bill on this subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be done when the bill reaches the Senate of course, but not while it is in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GORDON. Very well; I give notice that I shall make the motion in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DENNIS. I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, Mr. STOCKTON. He would vote against this amendment, and I would vote for it.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, Mr. BROWNLOW. He would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. JONES. I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas, Mr. DORSEY. He would vote for this amendment, and I should vote against it.

Mr. KELLY. I am paired on this question with the Senator from Arkansas, Mr. CLAYTON. He would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 31, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Carpenter, Conover, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, West, and Windom—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sherman, Stevenson, Stewart, Thurman, and Wadleigh—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Flanagan, Gilbert, Jones, Kelly, Scott, Stockton, and Wright 15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. I now move to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert what I send to the table as a substitute for the whole bill.

The words proposed to be inserted were read, as follows:

That the maximum limit of United States notes for circulation is hereby fixed at $400,000,000, at which sum it shall remain. That $46,000,000 in notes for circulation, in addition to such circulation now allowed by law, shall be issued to national banking associations now organized and which may be organized hereafter; and such increased circulation shall be distributed among the several States as provided in section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to insert at the end of the substitute offered by the Senator from North Carolina the following:

And that so much of the twenty-seventh section of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, and of the several acts supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof; and such of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870; and so much or such parts of any other act or acts of Congress as limit, or as may be construed to limit or restrict, the entire amount of notes for circulation to be issued under the said act of June 3, 1864, and the several supplements thereto, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that hereafter all associations organized, or that may be organized, for carrying on the business of banking, under the provisions of said act, shall be free to establish and organize national banks with circulation, at any place within the several States and Territories of the United States, upon the terms and conditions, and subject to all the limitations and restrictions, now provided by law, except the limitation upon the entire amount of circulation, which is hereby repealed.

SEC. —. That each national banking association, now organized or hereafter to be organized, shall keep and maintain, as a part of its reserve required by law, one-half part of the coin received by it as interest on bonds of the United States deposited as security for circulating notes or Government deposits; and that hereafter only one-half of the reserve now prescribed by law for national banking associations shall consist of balances due to an association available for the redemption of its circulating notes from associations in cities of redemption, and upon which balances no interest shall be paid.

I ask that this amendment be printed, if the Senate should now adjourn.

Mr. SCHURZ. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. LOGAN. I want to have my amendment ordered to be printed before we adjourn.

Mr. SCHURZ. Certainly; I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Before the motion to adjourn is made, I desire to ask of the Chair whether all the amendments that have been proposed are to the substitute for the entire bill proposed by the Senator from North Carolina?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are to be added to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina, which is a substitute for the bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then I propose to amend the section that we have already adopted on the motion of the Senator from Iowa. Manifestly Senators do not intend that this $18,000,000 that is now authorized as a fresh issue of legal-tenders shall be paid out for bonds of the United States at a large premium of 15 or 20 per cent., nor would they in time of peace advocate the doctrine of our issuing paper money to pay our ordinary current expenses. I therefore propose the following amendment, to come in at the end of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa which has just been adopted by a vote of the Senate:

But no part of the same shall be used in the purchase of bonds of the United States at above par, nor for the current expenses of the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, if it is in order, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I ask the Senator to withdraw that motion for a moment. I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, let it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio withdraw his motion?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will withdraw it simply to enable the Senator from Connecticut to have an amendment printed. It is not in order now to offer amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut gives notice of an amendment which he will offer to the bill; and it will be printed, if there be no objection.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. It is a substitute for the entire bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before putting the question on the motion to adjourn, the Chair will lay before the Senate a House bill for reference.

No objection was made, and it was ordered accordingly.

UTE INDIANS IN COLORADO.

Mr. MCNULTA. I ask unanimous consent of the House to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of House bill No. 2193, to ratify an agreement with certain Ute Indians in Colorado, and to make an appropriation for carrying out the same, in order that the bill may now be considered by the House. It is believed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, by whose instruction I make this request, that if Congress will pass this bill now the difficulties that are apprehended with these Indians may be avoided. I ask to have read a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs upon this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., March 23, 1874.

SIR: In reply to your verbal inquiry relative to the removal of trespassers from the Ute Indian reservation, in Colorado, I will state that owing to apprehended difficulties between such trespassers and the Indians the War Department was called upon about one year ago to remove the trespassers, and keep them off the reservation. Troops were moving for this purpose, but action was suspended, and further negotiations were had with the Indians, which resulted in their cession to the United States of a portion of their reserve, upon which numerous miners had taken up claims. It was solemnly agreed on the part of the United States, in consideration of such cession, that the Indians should be protected from trespassers on the portion of the reservation retained for their exclusive use and occupation. It appears, however, from information received from their agent, that white persons have entered upon their diminished reserve, where they have taken up ranches and located town sites, and that a party is concentrating near the line of the reservation to enter thereon in the early spring, for the purpose of passing over the same, if not for locating there. In view of these facts the honorable Secretary of War has recently been called upon to protect the Utes from these trespassers, and to afford them the protection guaranteed to them in the agreement now before Congress. Early action by that body upon the agreement in question is rendered necessary, in order that the boundaries of the Ute reserve may be definitely settled by law, and that trouble between the white settlers and the Indians may be avoided.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDWARD P. SMITH,
Commissioner.

Hon. JOHN MCNULTA,
House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to discharging the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of this bill, and considering the same in the House at this time?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONGER. I ask to have a report printed and recommitted.

Mr. MCNULTA. I object, and call for the regular order.

Mr. DAWES. If the House will indulge me a moment——

Mr. MCNULTA. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. A privileged report from the Committee on Ways and Means would be the regular order.

Mr. DAWES. I have not a privileged report, but I have a report from the Committee on Ways and Means which I think will not occupy two minutes of the time of the House, if I am allowed to state what it is.

Mr. MCNULTA. I object to anything being done out of the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The whole House would gain immensely in its business if the gentleman will only hold to that.

Mr. MCNULTA. I shall do so.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, it is the third reading of an engrossed bill, the bill (H. R. No. 1385) to regulate commerce by railroad among the several States.

The bill was then read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MCCRARY. I call the previous question upon the passage of hte bill. Pending that call I desire to say that several gentlemen were debarred from the privilege of speaking upon this bill yesterday.

Mr. NIBLACK. When the demand for the reading of the engrossed bill was made on yesterday, did not this bill go upon the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] demanded the reading of the engrossed bill. Pending that demand, and before there was time to ascertain whether the bill was engrossed or not, the motion to adjourn was made and agreed to. Had the House refused to adjourn, the bill would then have gone upon the Speaker's table.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. COX. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of this bill.

Mr. MCCRARY. I ask that permission be given to the several gentlemen who desired to speak upon this bill to have their remarks printed in the RECORD.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

Mr. COX. Does that allow everybody to print their remarks?

The SPEAKER. On this bill.

Mr. COX. Everybody?

The SPEAKER. Every gentleman who desires to.

Mr. COX. I wanted to discuss the tariff on this bill.

The SPEAKER. That would not have been in order.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD, in connection with some remarks I have prepared on this bill, an amendment which I would have offered had I had an opportunity.

There being no objection, leave was granted. (See Appendix.)

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the privilege of having printed in the RECORD a substitute which I desired to offer to the bill.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

The substitute is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That each and every line of railroad extending into or through two or more States, and employed in carrying freight or passengers between points or places in different States, and whether owned and operated by one company, corporation, or person, and known by one name, or owned and operated by several companies, corporations, or persons, and known by several different names, shall be regarded as employed in commerce among the several States; and the company or companies, corporation or corporations, person or persons, owning or operating such line of railroad shall be, both jointly and severally, liable for any violation of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That no such company, corporation, or person, so engaged in operating a line of railroad into or through two or more States as aforesaid shall charge, collect, demand, or receive more than a fair and reasonable rate of toll or compensation for the transportation of freight of any kind, or of passengers, or for the use or transportation of any railroad-car upon its track, loaded or unloaded, between places in different States. Such reasonable rate of toll or compensation shall be ascertained and fixed in the manner hereinafter provided. And for each and every violation of this act, by charging, collecting, demanding, or receiving more than such reasonable rate, the person or persons so offending shall be jointly and severally liable for extortion, as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 3. There shall be detailed by the President of the United States five officers of the Corps of Engineers, each of whom shall have been engaged on duty in connection with the public works of the United States not less than five years, who shall constitute a board of railroad commissioners.

SEC. 4. That said board of railroad commissioners shall institute a thorough investigation and inquiry into the rates of toll and compensation charged for transporting freights and passengers over each of such lines of railroad as are herein described and designated, and into the reasonableness thereof; and shall, as soon as practicable after such investigation and inquiry, prepare for the owners and operators of each of such lines (except such as may be omitted as hereinafter provided) a separate schedule of reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freight, and cars, loaded or unloaded, on or over said lines respectively. Said schedule shall be duly authenticated by said board of commissioners, shall be printed, and kept posted up in each of the offices and depots of such railroad company, corporation, or person. Said commissioners shall certify under their hands a printed or written copy of every schedule, and of every amendment to or revision of any schedule affecting any line of railroad, and cause the same to be filed in the office of the clerk of each of the circuit courts of the United States as soon as possible after the completion of such schedule, or of such amendment or revision; and such official copy, when so filed, shall be received and held in all courts as conclusive evidence of said schedules, whether original, amended, or revised, and of all things therein contained. Copies of the same duly certified, from said circuit clerk's office, shall be received and read as evidence on any trial, in any court, to the same extent as the original on file. And from and after the filing of such original, amended, or revised schedules in the clerk's office, the railroad companies, and all others interested therein, shall be deemed affected by notice thereof, and of the contents of the same. For the purpose of prosecuting any investigation under this act, and for the purpose of ascertaining and fixing such reasonable maximum rates of charges, the said board shall have the power to administer oaths, to take the testimony of witnesses, to send for persons and papers, and to require the production before them of books, records, and papers, and for this purpose they may issue process, which shall be served by any marshal or deputy marshal of the United States. And in case any person summoned to appear as a witness before said board shall fail or refuse to appear, or if any person required by said board to produce before them any books, records, or papers in his possession, shall fail or refuse to produce the same, it shall be the duty of the board forthwith to report the facts to the nearest judge of the district or circuit court of the United States, who shall hear the matter summarily, whether in term-time or vacation, and shall make such order in the premises as may be deemed proper to compel such person to appear before said board and answer all proper questions, and produce all papers, books, or records in his possession required by said board to be by him produced, and which, in the judgment of the court, are proper evidence to be considered by said board; and such judge may enforce his orders and punish disobedience thereto as in cases of contempt. Said commissioners may, from time to time, and so often as circumstances may require, change and revise said schedules, and shall give notice of such changes or revisions in the same manner as hereinbefore provided. The schedules aforesaid shall not be deemed invalid on account of any failure of the commissioners preparing the same to include therein all and every article or class of freight, but shall be held to be good and valid as to all articles or classes which are included or embraced therein; but it shall be the duty of such commissioners, whenever it comes to their knowledge that any article or class of freight has been omitted from any such schedule, to amend the same as soon as practicable by adding any such omitted articles or class: Provided, That if said board of railroad commissioners shall, after inquiry and investigation, be of the opinion that the charges of any one of the lines of railway described herein are already fair and reasonable, they may, in their discretion, omit to prepare a schedule for such line; but such omission shall only continue so long as the charges on such line shall continue to be fair and reasonable.

SEC. 5. That said board of railroad commissioners may sit at such place or places as they may see fit, and a majority of the members thereof shall constitute a quorum. A sub-committee of said board, of not less than three members, may sit for the purpose of taking testimony and making investigations under this act, and when so sitting such sub-committee shall have all the powers of said board in relation to taking testimony, administering oaths, issuing process, and compelling obedience thereto. Said board may also, at any time, depute any one of their number to take depositions, to be read in evidence at any hearing before the board, who shall have the same power to summon and examine witnesses and administer oaths as are herein given to the whole board. Persons duly summoned, who shall fail to appear or testify, or to produce any books, papers, or records in their possession when required, before such member, shall be liable to be proceeded against in the same way, and to the same penalties as are herein provided for failure or refusal to appear or testify, or to produce papers, records, or books before the whole board.

SEC. 6. That said board of railroad commissioners shall be authorized to employ a secretary, who shall be paid an annual salary of $3,000 to be paid as other salaries; and they shall also choose their president, and may adopt such rules and regulations for the government of their proceedings, not inconsistent with this act, as they may see fit. Witnesses summoned to appear and testify before said board, who are not officers or agents of any railroad company concerned in the investigation, shall be allowed and paid the same fees as witnesses when summoned to appear and testify before the courts of the United States; said fees to be certified by the president and secretary of the board, and audited and paid as the Secretary of the Interior may direct: Provided, That no witness shall be summoned from a place outside of the district in which the board or sub-committee may be sitting, unless the distance be less than one hundred miles.

SEC. 7. That any corporation, company, or person being engaged in the operation of any line of railroad into or through two or more States as aforesaid, who shall, after such schedule shall have taken effect in relation thereto, be guilty of extortion by charging, collecting, demanding, or receiving more than a reasonable rate of toll or compensation for the transportation of freight, passengers, or cars over or upon any such line, shall forfeit and pay for each offense a sum of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, to be recovered by action to be brought in the name of the United States in any district or circuit court of the United States, or, if in a Territory, in any district court of the United States therein, in the form of an action of debt, or by such other form of action as may be provided by the law of the State in which such action is brought in like cases; and it shall be the duty of the district attorney for the proper district to institute and prosecute all suits for the recovery of the penalty aforesaid; and the corporation, company, or person being guilty of such extortion shall also be liable to the party injured thereby for the damages caused by such extortion, including a reasonable sum for attorneys' fees, to be fixed by the court trying the case, which such injured party may recover by action in his own name in either of the courts aforesaid; and the form of the action may be the same as in case of a suit to recover the penalty as hereinbefore provided. Either party to any action brought under the provisions of this act shall have the right to a trial by jury, and in any action instituted under the provisions of this act, whether it be a suit to recover the penalty aforesaid or a suit by the party injured to recover damages as aforesaid, any number of separate and distinct violations of the provisions of this act may be stated separately in separate counts, and a recovery may be had upon each. If, upon the trial of any such suit, brought either to recover said penalty or to recover damages as aforesaid, it shall be made to appear that the defendant has charged, collected, demanded, or received, for the transportation of freight or passengers or cars, a rate of toll or compensation greater than that fixed by the schedule aforesaid, then, and in that case, such defendant shall be deemed and held guilty of extortion, and liable therefor, unless such defendant shall show affirmatively that the rate charged, collected, demanded, or received for such transportation was nevertheless fair and reasonable: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be deemed and taken to diminish or take away any common-law right of action on the part of individuals aggrieved against such railroad corporation or common carriers, or any action taken in the matter by any State so far as regards commerce within the control of such State.

SEC. 8. That the provisions of this act shall apply to all persons, firms, companies, or associations, whether incorporated or not, who are or may be engaged as carriers of freight and passengers, or in carrying fricight only, or in carrying passengers only, upon any lines of railway extending into or through two or more States; but this act shall not be construed as extending to or affecting such commerce as is actually, and in good faith, completely internal within any one of the several States. Each of the schedules of charges herein provided shall take effect from and after thirty days from the date of its being filed in the clerk's office as aforesaid.

SEC. 9. That in all cases where two or more persons, companies, or corporations unite together for the purpose of transporting freight or passengers over several lines of railroad from a place in one State to a place in another State, the several lines thus operated together shall be treated, for all the purposes of this act, as one line; and each and every of such persons, companies, and corporations shall be bound by the provisions of this act, and liable for any violation thereof. And in all cases where several lines of railway are united, or connected together, and engaged in carrying freight or passengers into or through two or more States, by a continuous route, whether under one management or not, it shall not be lawful for them, or any of them, to evade the operation of this act by any form of contract designed for that purpose; and it shall be competent in all suits brought under this act to show that the defendant was in fact, when the alleged extortion occurred, engaged in operating a part of a continuous line of interstate commerce; and upon such fact being made to appear, such defendant shall be held subject to the provisions of this act, whatever the character or form of the contract between such defendant and the shipper may have been.

SEC. 10. That it shall be the duty of said railroad commissioners to personally investigate and ascertain whether the provisions of this act are violated by any corporations, companies, or persons engaged in the business of transportation as aforesaid; and for the purpose of making such investigations they shall have all the powers conferred upon them by section 5 of this act; and whenever the facts in any manner ascertained shall, in their judgment, warrant a prosecution, it shall be the duty of said commissioners to cause suit to be commenced and prosecuted against the offending party or parties, to recover the penalties provided by this act in such cases. And the several district attorneys shall, whenever informed in any way that this act has been violated, institute the necessary proceedings for enforcing the penalties herein provided. Suits brought under this act may be commenced in any district through or into which the line of the corporation, company, or person sued may extend; and service of process may be made upon any agent or officer of such corporation, company, or person within such district.

SEC. 11. That each and every provision of this act shall apply to lines of railroad within the Territories of the United States, and to all lines extending from a place in one of the States to a place within any one of such Territories, and to any and all corporations, companies, or persons engaged in the operation of any such lines, to the same extent and in the same manner, as to such lines, as may extend from a place in one State to a place in another State.

SEC. 12. That the railroad commissioners aforesaid shall, before entering upon the discharge of their duties, severally take and subscribe an oath or affirmation that they will honestly, faithfully, and impartially discharge the duties of said office; which oath shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior. In case of voluntary collusion on the part of said commissioners, or either of them, with any railroad company or other party, to delay, defeat, or hinder the proper enforcement of this act, or willful negligence to perform any duties required thereby, proceedings shall be at once commenced by indictment, at the instance of the United States attorney for the proper district, in any circuit court of the United States where the offense may have been committed, for malfeasance in office, and on conviction of the same such person or persons so found guilty shall be fined not less than $10,000 nor more than $50,000, and shall in addition be sentenced to imprisonment for not less than three nor more than ten years, and be disqualified from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; and the court, in its discretion, may direct such person or persons so convicted to be imprisoned until such fine and costs be paid; and a lien is hereby declared in favor of the United States on all the real property of any commissioner so convicted from the day of the date of the return of the indictment into court.

SEC. 13. That in addition to the other duties of said board of railroad commissioners, they shall gather, collate, and annually report to Congress statistics and facts relating to commerce among the several States by railroad; to the construction and operation of railroads; and to the actual cost of such construction and operation, as well as to the actual cost of transportation of freight and passengers by railroad, and the profits realized by carriers. And they shall also inquire, and from time to time report to Congress, what, if any, further legislation by Congress is necessary for the just and reasonable regulation of such commerce, or for defining the rights and duties of persons engaged as common carriers on lines extending from State to State, for securing the safety and convenience of persons traveling thereby, or for the protection of immigrants traveling upon such lines. And for these purposes they shall have power to require returns to be made to them by all railroad companies, and by all persons and companies engaged in transportation by railroad. And in prosecuting their investigations under this section they shall have all the powers in relation to obtaining evidence and examining witnesses which are conferred by section 5 of this act. And if any railroad company or person, being required and notified by said board to make return to them of any facts, or to answer any interrogatories, concerning any of the matters about which said board is authorized to inquire, shall fail or refuse so to do for ninety days after the time fixed by said board for making such return, they shall forfeit and pay to the United States a penalty of not less than $5,000 for each offense, to be sued for and recovered as is hereinbefore provided in relation to other penalties.

SEC. 14. That all unjust discrimination in the matter of charges for carrying freight or passengers over or upon any such line of railroad as is herein described is hereby prohibited; and any corporation, company, or person engaged in operating any such line of railroad who shall be guilty of any such unjust discrimination in making or collecting such charges, in favor of or against any person, firm, or company, or in favor of or against any particular place on the line or at a terminus of such road, shall be subject to the same penalty as that provided in cases of extortion under this act; and such penalty shall be enforced in the same manner as in such cases of extortion; and the party injured by any such unjust discrimination shall have his action for damages in the same manner as in cases of extortion.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desired to make some remarks on this bill yesterday, in favor of the power of Congress to pass it. I have not reduced them to writing, and therefore I cannot print them.

Mr. COX. I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD an amendment providing for reducing the tariff on railroad iron. I think this is kindred to the subject of transportation. I ask also to print in connection with this amendment some remarks on the subject.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. HOUGHTON. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a substitute for this bill, which I would have offered had I had an opportunity.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

The substitute is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That each and every corporation, company, association, individual, or individuals engaged partially or wholly in the business of transporting, for hire, persons or property between, into, or through any of the States or Territories of the United States shall be, as to such business, considered as engaged in commerce between the States, and held to be common carriers; and shall be subject to all the duties, obligations, and liabilities imposed by the common law upon common carriers; and, for the transportation of persons, property, or cars between, into, or through such States or Territories, shall not ask or demand more than a reasonable compensation, and shall not make unjust discriminations in rates of fare, freight, or toll.

SEC. 2. That any corporation, company, association, individual, or individuals engaged in commerce between the States, as defined in the first section of this act, which shall demand, receive, or collect more than a reasonable rate of fare, freight, or toll for the transportation of persons, property, or cars, shall be deemed guilty of extortion, and shall forfeit and pay for each offense not less than $500, nor more than $5,000; and it shall be the duty of the district attorney of the United States for the proper district, upon application by any person or persons, firm or company aggrieved,o toinstitute, and prosecute, in the name of the United States, in the district court of the United States for his district, a suit for the recovery of the penalty aforesaid; and the corporation, company, association, individual, or individuals adjudged guilty of such extortion shall also be liable to the party or parties injured thereby for the damages sustained by such party or parties, by reason of such extortion, including a reasonable sum for attorneys' fees to be fixed by the court, which such injured party or parties may recover by action prosecuted in his own name in such court; and the judgment in the case, instituted and prosecuted in the name of the United States as herein provided, on the complaint of the party seeking to recover damages for extortion, shall be conclusive between the party seeking to recover damages and the party or parties against whom damages are claimed: Provided, That before any act hereby authorized shall be instituted, the party complaining shall give an undertaking, with at least two sureties to be approved by the court or judge in such sum as the court or judge may fix, conditioned that if the fact of extortion be not established by the judgment of the court in the action instituted at his instance, he will pay all costs incurred in the action, and the district attorney shall, in all cases of liability upon any such undertaking, in case the costs be not paid, institute and prosecute in the name of the United States an action against the sureties thereon for the recovery thereof.

SEC. 3. The district courts of the United States shall have original jurisdiction in all cases of complaint arising within their respective districts against the corporations, companies, associations, or individuals herein mentioned for any violation of the provisions of this act. Either party to any such action shall have the right to a trial by jury; but unless a jury be demanded by one of the parties the action may be tried by the court, and either party may appeal from the judgment of the district court to the circuit court of the United States, the judgment of which last-mentioned court shall be final. Upon the trial of any suit brought to recover the penalty for a violation of this act, the act complained of shall be held prima facie extortion. And if the defendant fails to prove that the charge complained of was not unreasonable, judgment shall be rendered in favor of the plaintiff for such sum as may be fixed by the court or jury; but if the defendant shall make it appear to the satisfaction of the court or jury, that the amount charged, collected, or received was not an unreasonable charge for the service rendered, judgment shall be entered for the defendant for costs.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill, on which the yeas and nays have been called for by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 121, nays 116, not voting 53; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call, the following announcements were made:

Mr. BOWEN. I am requested by my colleague from Virginia, Mr. SMITH, to state that he is absent on professional business; that he is paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. CRITTENDEN. My colleague, if he were present, would vote "ay," while Mr. CRITTENDEN would vote "no."

Mr. ARCHER. My colleague, Mr. SWANN, has been compelled to return to his home by reason of sickness.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to say that I was absent from the House yesterday on account of sickness. I now vote "no."

Mr. RICE. The agreement entered into between myself and the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. STANARD, still obtains. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

Mr. ROBBINS. My colleague, Mr. LEACH, is detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. BECK. My colleague, Mr. JOHN YOUNG BROWN, is detained from the House by sickness in his family. If here, he would vote "no."

Mr. KELLEY. I am desired to say that the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. WADDELL, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. WOODFORD, who are temporarily absent from the House, are paired. I cannot state how either of them would vote.

When the roll-call was concluded,

Mr. PIERCE said: I was detained from the House during the roll-call, and was not able to return before it was completed. Had I been present, I should have voted against the bill.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. MCCRARY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ASIATIC COMMERCIAL COMPANY.

Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, presented from the Committee on Commerce a report on the bill to incorporate the Asiatic Commercial Company; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

RECONSIDERATION OF REFERENCES.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, moved to reconsider the votes by which bills, reports, &c., were referred or recommitted this morning; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the amendments of the Senate to a bill (H. R. No. 1037) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repair of certain fortifications and other works of defense, with the recommendation that they be concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

On page 1, line 4, after the word "defense," insert "for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875."

Amend the title to read as follows:

An act making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repair of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The amendments of the Senate do not increase the appropriations included in the bill as it went from the House, but simply limit the appropriations. For some years these fortification bills have been reported without any limitation upon the appropriations, but the amendments of the Senate, in which the Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence, limit the appropriations to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. STARKWEATHER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FUR-SEALS OF ALASKA.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Ways and Means, to which I think there will be no objection if the House will only listen long enough to let me tell exactly what it is I wish to report.

The fur-seal trade of Alaska, under the act of Congress which conferred it all upon one company, proceeds upon the ground that all the fur-seals resort to two particular islands which were purchased by us from Russia under the Alaska treaty. They yield an annual income to the Government of between two hundred and fifty and three hundred thousand dollars. It is necessary, however, that we should ascertain whether we get entirely all that is our due; and therefore, to ascertain the fact whether fur-seals do resort to any of the Russian islands, the Treasury Department sent an agent last year up there to report upon the habits of the fur-seals. He has made a most interesting report to the Government containing surveys of these islands. His relations to the Russian settlements up there have become such that he has peculiar ability at this time to circulate around among the Russian possessions, and especially among these islands, so as to be able fully to report to the United States upon the fact whether fur-seals do resort to any other island. When we get that information we will then be able to know whether in the markets of the world we do get the tax which is our due upon all the fur-seals.

A ship leaves San Francisco once a year to go to these islands, and it leaves about the 1st of May. The Treasury Department wants authority to send this agent upon a mission of exploration around and among these islands for the purpose I have indicated. This bill is solely for that purpose—for the purpose of ascertaining accurate information which it is necessary for the Government to have—and the bill only provides for giving him eight dollars a day for the time he is employed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman will permit this bill to be referred to the Committee on Commerce, which has exclusive control over this legislation. I do not think this bill is at all necessary, but it ought to be considered by the Committee on Commerce; and I hope the gentleman will allow it to go to that committee which of all others has the immediate charge of this subject.

Mr. DAWES. I have not the slightest objection to this bill going there. If it had occurred in the beginning, I would have had it sent there. If the gentleman will hear the bill read I do not think he will object to it, for if it is passed at all it ought to be passed now.

Mr. MCNULTA. Does this bill come up in regular order?

The SPEAKER. It does not; the gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent.

Mr. MCNULTA. Then I object.

Mr. DAWES. I stated the only object is to get this bill passed before the ship which leaves once a year starts from San Francisco for these islands. If the House will give me leave to report it at any time, I will take that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, with leave to report at any time.

Mr. DAWES. That will satisfy me.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Let me ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether the only object of the bill is not to provide an office for somebody at eight dollars a day? That seems to me about all there is in it.

Mr. DAWES. The bill provides for exactly what I have stated to the House. If it is not proper the House should not pass it, but if the Committee on Commerce have leave to report at any time I do not object.

Mr. MCNULTA. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. DAWES. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, with leave to report at any time.

Mr. RANDALL. If the bill creates an office, I object to leave being given to report it at any time.

Mr. BURCHARD. It creates no permanent office.

Mr. DAWES. I would not like to have the bill referred to the committee without the privilege of reporting it back at any time.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Speaker ask unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts again asks that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce with leave to report it back at any time. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The bill (H. R. No. 2368) was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, with leave to report it back at any time.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MCNULTA,] on behalf of the Committee on Indian Affairs, repeats his request, made some time ago, in regard to the bill to ratify an agreement with certain Ute Indians in Colorado. He asks unanimous consent that the bill may be brought before the House for consideration at this time.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am strongly urged by members on both sides of the House to ask that the currency bill be now taken up.

The SPEAKER. That is the special order at half-past one, and will be reached in a few minutes. The Chair thought that some requests might be disposed of in the meanwhile, as there is too little time for the morning hour to intervene. The Clerk will report the bill in charge of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MCNULTA,] and the Chair will then ask for objections, if there be any, to its present consideration.

Mr. MAYNARD. Do I understand the Chair correctly as saying that the currency bill will be in order at half-past one?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MAYNARD. I was under the impression that it came up directly after the transportation bill was disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The currency bill has the precise place which the transportation bill has for some time occupied, of being the special order at half-past one o'clock every day.

Mr. GARFIELD. Appropriation bills are excepted.

The SPEAKER. Certainly. But this is a special order, if the House does not go into committee on the appropriation bill, which is a matter for the House to decide.

Mr. RANDALL. Will there be a morning hour to-day?

The SPEAKER. There is not sufficient time intervening before half-past one o'clock for a morning hour to-day.

UTE INDIANS IN COLORADO.

Mr. MCNULTA. I now ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2193) to ratify an agreement with certain Ute Indians in Colorado, and to make an appropriation for carrying out the same, and that it be brought before the House for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which objections, if any, will be in order.

The bill was read.

It ratifies and confirms a certain agreement made by Felix R. Brunot, commissioner on the part of the United States, with certain Ute Indians in Colorado. Said agreement is in words and figures following, namely:

Articles of convention, made and entered into at the Los Pinos agency for the Ute Indians, on the 13th day of September, 1873, by and between Felix R. Brunot, commissioner in behalf of the United States, and the chiefs, head-men, and men of the Tabequache, Muache, Capote, Weeminuche, Yampa, Grand River, and Uintah bands of Ute Indians, witnesseth:

That whereas a treaty was made with the confederated bands of the Ute Nation on the 2d day of March, A. D. 1868, and proclaimed by the President of the United States on the 6th day of November, 1868, the second article of which defines by certain lines the limits of a reservation to be owned and occupied by the Ute Indians; and whereas by an act of Congress approved April 23, 1872, the Secretary of the Interior was authorized and empowered to enter into negotiations with the Ute Indians in Colorado for the extinguishment of their rights to a certain portion of said reservation, and a commission was appointed on the 1st day of July, 1872, to conduct said negotiation; and whereas, said negotiation having failed owing to the refusal of said Indians to relinquish their right to any portion of said reservation, a new commission was appointed by the Secretary of the Interior by letter of June 2, 1873, to conduct said negotiation:

Now, therefore, Felix R. Brunot, commissioner in behalf of the United States, and the chiefs and people of the Tabequache, Muache, Capote, Weeminuche, Yampa, Grand River, and Uintah, the confederated bands of the Ute Nation, do enter into the following agreement:

ARTICLE 1. The confederated band of the Ute Nation hereby relinquish to the United States all right, title, and claim and interest in and to the following-described portion of the reservation heretofore conveyed to them by the United States, namely: Beginning at a point on the eastern boundary of said reservation fifteen miles due north of the southern boundary of the Territory of Colorado, and running thence west on a line parallel to the said southern boundary to a point on said line twenty miles due east of the western boundary of Colorado Territory; thence north by a line parallel with the western boundary to a point ten miles north of the point where said line intersects the thirty-eighth parallel of north latitude; thence east to the eastern boundary of the Ute reservation; and thence south along said boundary to the place of beginning: Provided, That if any part of the Uncompagre Park shall be found to extend south of the north line of said described country, the same is not intended to be included therein, and is hereby reserved and retained as a portion of the Ute reservation.

ART. 2. The United States shall permit the Ute Indians to hunt upon said lands so long as the game lasts and the Indians are at peace with the white people.

ART. 3. The United States agree to set apart and hold, as a perpetual trust for the Ute Indians, a sum of money, or its equivalent in bonds, which shall be sufficient to produce the sum of $25,000 per annum; which sum of $25,000 per annum shall be disbursed or invested at the discretion of the President, or as he may direct, for the use and benefit of the Ute Indians annually forever.

ART. 4. The United States agrees, so soon as the President may deem it necessary and expedient, to erect proper buildings and establish an agency for the Weeminuche, Muache, and Capote bands of Ute Indians at some suitable point, to be hereafter selected, on the southern part of the Ute reservation.

ART. 5. All the provisions of the treaty of 1868, not altered by this agreement, shall continue in force, and the following words from article 2 of said treaty, namely, "The United States now solemnly agrees that no persons except those herein authorized so to do, and except such officers, agents, and employés of the Government as may be authorized to enter upon Indian reservations in discharge of duties enjoined by law, shall ever be permitted to pass over, settle upon, or reside in the territory described in this article, except as herein otherwise provided," are hereby expressly reaffirmed, except so far as they apply to the country herein relinquished.

ART. 6. In consideration of the services of Ouray, head chief of the Ute Nation, he shall receive a salary of $1,000 per annum for the term of ten years, or so long as he shall remain head chief of the Utes and at peace with the people of the United States.

ART. 7. This agreement is subject to ratification or rejection by the Congress of the United States and of the President.

[SEAL.] FELIX R. BRUNOT,
Commissioner.

[Signed by the Indian chiefs by their marks.]

The second section of the bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue, set apart, and hold, as a perpetual fund, in trust for the Ute Indians, a sufficient amount of 5 per cent. bonds of the United States, the interest on which shall be $25,000 per annum; which interest shall be paid annually, as the President of the United States may direct, for the benefit of said Indians.

The third section provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be paid to Ouray $1,000, as the first installment due him annually, so long as he shall be chief of said Ute Indians; and appropriates, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $1,000 for that purpose.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question, as I did not hear the whole of the bill read. Does it propose to make an appropriation?

Mr. MCNULTA. It provides for the payment of $25,000 annually.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. The payment of the $25,000 is provided by a clause of the treaty. Is it proposed to appropriate that money?

Mr. MCNULTA. The bill proposes that the Secretary of the Treasury shall set aside 5 per cent. bonds, the interest on which shall be $25,000 per annum, and shall be paid annually. When the first year's interest is due, an appropriation will be made by Congress. There is in the bill an appropriation of $1,000 to be paid to Ouray, the chief of the Utes of Colorado.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. The agreement provides, as I understand, that the annuity shall be a permanent annuity of $25,000.

Mr. MCNULTA. A perpetual annuity of $25,000 as a compensation for the land conveyed.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. How much land does the Government get by this treaty?

Mr. MCNULTA. About four million acres of the most valuable mining lands in America.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I must object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. MCNULTA. This is only a question of time, and we urge the consideration of the bill now only on the ground that it is necessary to get it through, to prevent, it may be, an Indian war. On April 23, 1873, Congress passed an act for the appointment of commissioners to negotiate with the Ute Indians in Colorado for the cession to the Government of the southern portion of their reservation. The commissioners treated with the Indians, but unsuccessfully.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] insist upon his objection?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I do.

Mr. MCNULTA. O, there is an objection. I was not aware of it, and beg the Speaker's pardon. I thought that consent had been given.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought that the gentleman from Iowa was disposed to waive his objection. But he insists on it, and it is his right to do so.

Mr. AVERILL. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection. This bill has had very careful consideration, and is approved by the commissioners and by the Committee on Indian Affairs; and it is a bill, in my judgment, of the greatest public necessity. The gentleman who has it in charge is in a position to show that, unless the bill passes immediately, results of a serious nature will ensue; that war will be inevitable with those Indians. The question has been fully investigated, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. McNULTA. I desire to have it understood that the urgency of the committee for the passage of this bill is only for the purpose of preventing an Indian war. The Government is in the wrong. The Government is violating its treaties to-day with the Indians, and if there is an outbreak, it will be caused by the failure of Congress to carry out this agreement. If the gentleman objects, of course I will yield the floor and let the scalping go on, political and otherwise. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. My objection to the bill is that it confirms a treaty lasting forever; but as the Committee on Indian Affairs seem very anxious that it shall be taken up, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McNULTA] will consent to an amendment so as to limit the time during which this annuity shall be paid. Let him limit it to one thousand years, or one hundred years; but let there be a limit somewhere. I suggest that he say fifty years.

Mr. McNULTA. Wait until I get unanimous consent to have the bill considered.

The SPEAKER. Objection is withdrawn, and the bill is before the House. If the gentleman desires to put the bill upon its passage, he has ten minutes in which to do it.

Mr. McNULTA. Mr. Speaker, I would be willing to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] but it will be apparent that if it were adopted the agreement must be sent back by the Commissioner to the Indians for their ratification thereof. Months of time would be consumed, and the very purpose for which the committee ask the passage of this bill defeated. We want to give the Indians the rights they are entitled to under the treaty. If they do not get them soon I apprehend they will make a fight for them. They have been waiting for the action of this Congress or of the Government since April, 1872. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McNULTA moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT SAPELLO SOUND.

Mr. HOOPER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 60) instructing the Light-house Board to examine into and report to Congress as early as practicable upon the feasibility and importance of the erection and establishment of a light-house and necessary buoys at Sapello Sound, on the coast of Georgia.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOOPER moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OOSTENAULA AND COOSAWATTEE RIVERS.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish to this House any additional information he may have concerning the surveys of the Oostenaula and Coosawattee Rivers, in the State of Georgia.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPRESENTATIVE AT LARGE FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to present the credentials of a member elect to this House from the State of Louisiana. I ask that they be read; and then I shall move that they be referred to the Committee on Elections, with instructions to consider them in relation to the case.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF LOUISIANA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
March 11, 1874.

Whereas I have been given to understand that doubts have arisen as to the validity of the credentials of Hon. P. B. S. Pinchback, to a seat in the House of Representatives as Representative at large from the State of Louisiana, because said credentials were signed by himself while acting governor of the State of Louisiana, do certify that it appears from the records and returns of the votes given at the election on November 4, 1872, for member of Congress at large for Louisiana, now on record in the office of the secretary of state of the State of Louisiana, that Hon. P. B. S. Pinchback was duly elected by a majority of the votes cast at said election as Representative at large for the State of Louisiana in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and is duly and legally entitled to his seat as such Representative.

In testimony whereof I have caused the seal of the State of Louisiana to be affixed to this certificate under my own hand, and countersigned by the secretary of state, this 11th day of March, A. D. 1874, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-eighth.

WM. P. KELLOGG,
Governor of Louisiana.

P. G. DESLONDE,
Secretary of State.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the credentials be referred to the Committee on Elections, with instructions that the committee consider them in their determination of the case.

Mr. SPEER. I suppose the House will not make the order that the committee shall consider them.

The SPEAKER. The reference implies consideration.

The motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, was agreed to.

AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY, BIBLE HOUSE,
Astor Place, New York, March 24, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to state to you that the American Bible Society proposes holding its fifty-eighth anniversary in the city of Washington, Sunday evening, May 17, 1874.

As this society is neither sectional nor denominational but pre-eminently national, the board of managers have deemed it very fitting that its coming anniversary should be held in the Hall of the House of Representatives of the United States.

The object of this communication is to request through you from the honorable members of the House the use of the Hall on that evening for this purpose.

Permit me to direct your attention to the fact that the American Bible Society held its meeting in the Hall in the year 1844. Hon. John Quincy Adams, senior vice-president of the society, presided, assisted by Hon. Judge McLean and Hon. Robert Dunlap.

The following gentlemen, now resident at Washington, are vice-presidents of the society: Hon. HORACE MAYNARD, Hon. F. T. FRELINGHUYSEN, Hon. WILLIAM A. BUCKINGHAM, Hon. GEORGE G. WRIGHT, and Hon. Judge Strong.

Hoping that this application will meet your cordial approval and support, I have the honor to remain,

Very respectfully, yours, in behalf of the American Bible Society,
ALEX. McLEAN,
Corresponding Secretary of the American Bible Society.

Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The original application was for Thursday evening, May 21, to which the Chair replied that under the rules there was no possible chance of granting the use of the Hall for a secular evening, the rule being so absolute that the Chair was not permitted even to entertain a motion for that purpose. At the suggestion of the Chair the change was made to Sunday, the rule absolutely placing the direction of the Hall for purposes of divine service on Sunday within the discretion of the Chair. The Chair gives notice that he has responded to the application and informed the society that on Sunday evening, May 17, they will be entitled to the use of this Hall for the purpose indicated.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House the bill reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency comes up at half-past one to-day, as the special order for that hour, and from day to day until disposed of, subject to the right of the House to go into Committee of the Whole on appropriation bills.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to suggest to the House, and to the gentleman who has charge of the currency bill, [Mr. MAYNARD,] whether an agreement cannot now be made as to the length of time to be taken in the discussion of that bill. If such an agreement could be made I would regard it as very important, as the House has now entered upon the sea of discussion concerning paper money, that the House should determine what it will do. But if we propose to enter upon a limitless debate, I shall feel it necessary to ask the House to at least finish the legislative appropriation bill before proceeding with this currency bill. While on the floor I wish to say that the Senate has now passed every appropriation bill which the House has sent to them, and the Committee on Appropriations in the Senate are without work.

Mr. MERRIAM. Let the Senate take up the subject of banking and currency.

Mr. GARFIELD. They have been upon that subject for three months without coming to any conclusion. I should hope that in two days we would be able to finish the legislative appropriation bill and send it to the Senate, and with that large bill they would have something to do, and the work upon the subject of appropriations could be going on. If the gentleman in charge of this bill can now say to the House that we can agree upon a time reasonably short, at the end of which a vote can be had upon this bill, I for one will do what I can to help to carry out such an arrangement. I am authorized to say for the Committee on Appropriations that they would consent to waive the legislative bill on these conditions. If such an agreement cannot be made, we shall feel compelled to try the sense of the House on the question of going on with the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If my friend from Tennessee [Mr.

MAYNARD] will allow me, I would suggest that we take the vote upon this bill next Tuesday, and in the mean time go on with its discussion.

Mr. MAYNARD. When I asked the House to make this bill a special order, I gave a pledge that I would allow a fair time for a discussion of the question. That pledge is still upon me, and I do not feel at liberty to violate the spirit of it. On the other hand, there is a manifest desire on the part of gentlemen in the House, corresponding to a sentiment very widely entertained throughout the country, that this subject of the currency shall be brought to a conclusion at the earliest practicable moment, that it may be seen what the House will do finally upon this great question. I submit, however, that before we enter upon the discussion of the question at all, before a single gentleman of the committee reporting this bill has been heard, before we have any indication of the range which the debate is likely to take in the House, it would be going further than the chairman of the committee in charge of this bill would be warranted in going to fix the limit of debate at this moment. As soon, however, as it is apparent that the House is satisfied with the extent of the discussion, I shall endeavor to bring it to a close by testing the sense of the House upon a call of the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Why not test the sense of the House now? If the House decides the question, that will of course exempt the gentleman from Tennessee from any imputation of bad faith.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let the debate be extended until next Wednesday.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to say a word further. Several gentlemen of the committee desire to be heard. I speak what is known to the House when I say that scarcely a gentleman upon the committee has occupied the attention of the House in a speech during this session. Gentlemen have prepared themselves to discuss this subject, and it seems to me but right and fair to them that they should at least have an opportunity to make known the reasons on which they either support or oppose this measure.

Mr. COX. I desire to say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that if he wants business to progress he had better insist on going through with the appropriation bill. We have substantially disposed of the currency question. It has been debated all through the country, through the press, and in this House. And if gentlemen have speeches prepared, let them do what was done on the transportation bill, deliver them at night sessions or morning sessions. The people understand this business just as well now as they will when the Banking and Currency Committee shall have been heard; and I think I may say that members are almost ready to vote upon it. If gentlemen want to close up this session soon, let them insist on going through with this long appropriation bill so as to give the Senate some work. As one of the working men of this House, I hope the gentleman from Ohio will insist on making this a test question now by a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the appropriation bill.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. As one of the members of the Committee on Banking and Currency I wish to say a word. Mr. Speaker, no question coming before us at the present session approaches in importance this currency question, including the legal-tender bill, upon which we have been forced to vote without one word of debate. This is the most important subject before this Congress, involving, as some of us think, the honor of the nation, and possibly at some future day the repudiation in part, if not wholly, of the national debt. We have not had a single hour of legitimate discussion upon this subject. It is true many gentlemen have taken advantage of Saturday afternoons and of evening sessions to interject speeches on this question; but we have had no fair debate upon it. Now, I do not know but that a large majority of this House is prepared to plunge into indiscriminate inflation; but before that is done I, for one, want a fair opportunity to enter my indignant protest against it by a denunciation of the whole business. If you have anything more important than this question, I would like to know what it is. I would much prefer that the appropriation bill should be taken up and gone through with, and that then we should dispose deliberately of this currency question. I object to any attempt to cut down the discussion of it to one, two, or three days.

Mr. POLAND. It may make some difference in the arrangements that may be made about this bill to know whether the Committee on Revision of the Laws will occupy this evening. We have not been able to bring our work to a close; and therefore I shall not ask any session this evening upon the revision of the laws.

Mr. MAYNARD. I give notice that I shall endeavor to press this discussion so far as may be decorous, so that no time shall be lost, and that a conclusion may be attained at the earliest proper moment.

Mr. COBURN. It is entirely possible that the House may be compelled on next Monday, under a suspension of the rules, to act upon this very question of the currency as we were compelled last Monday to act upon another branch of it. If the discussion of this subject is postponed until after next Monday, it is possible that all we may do this session upon the question will be done by a vote given next Monday without possibility of explanation.

Several MEMBERS. That is so.

Mr. COBURN. I hope the debate will commence now and will continue until the question is settled. If we wait until after next Monday, we may be forced to vote for something that none of us absolutely desire to go for, or against something that we do not wish to oppose. We are bound to be thrown into an awkward position unless we go on with the debate at once.

Mr. NIBLACK. This is the seventh long session at which I have had the honor to be in this House; and during much of that time I have been connected with the Committee on Appropriations. I have never known the current business of the House—that is to say, the appropriation bills—to be so much behind as they are at this time. If we intend to adjourn before August I think our first duty is to go into Committee of the Whole upon the appropriation bills during the business hours of every day not occupied imperatively by some other business. Morning and evening sessions can be devoted to purposes of debate. But in this large House, if we consume the business hours of the day with much general debate upon any subject, it will be impossible for us to get away from here before midsummer. Hence, without any discourtesy toward the Committee on Banking and Currency, I think they ought to take their chances, as the Committee on Ways and Means have done on their branch of this business, and endeavor to get in their speeches without occupying time during business hours, which, I repeat, must be given to the appropriation bills, if we expect to adjourn before midsummer.

Mr. RANDALL. For one, I should like to have the House hear this question of banking and currency discussed. I consider it the most important subject with which Congress is called upon now to deal. I am getting somewhat impatient under the lash of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who is constantly pressing us in regard to the appropriation bills. I have no doubt that the appropriation bills will be passed, and passed in entirely too large an amount, under the auspices of the gentleman from Ohio.

This effort to have the Committee on Banking and Currency tied down to a day, it seems to me, is all wrong. It has not been done as to reports from any other committee on any other subject of equal or like moment. I am glad the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency stands firm, and I hope the House will grant to him this privilege to take up this bill at this time and proceed to a fair and deliberate discussion of the whole subject. When the House seems weary of it, or when we have approached an intelligent solution—if we ever do so—then it will be in the power of the House at any moment to cut off debate. I hope this bill will be allowed to be discussed at present.

Notwithstanding it interferes with this appropriation bill, we know that that appropriation bill will not ultimately be endangered. Mark you, Mr. Speaker, the appropriations asked for in this bill do not take effect until the next fiscal year. There is therefore no occasion for all this haste and hurry.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of no sort of consequence whether the appropriation bill is passed this week or next week or the week after. If we pass the appropriation bill prior to the close of this present fiscal year, it will be in ample time to meet all the wants of the Government. But here, sir, is a question which gentlemen have well said is of infinite moment to the country and to all business men of the country. We have among us here gentlemen who are in favor of inflating the currency; we have those who are in favor of contracting the currency; and we have those who are in favor of doing nothing on this subject. We have among us members who are in favor of free banking; we have those who are in favor of issuing an additional but limited amount of national-bank paper; and then, again, we have men who are in favor of issuing additional "greenbacks," among whom, I believe, is my distinguished friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] Here is a great diversity of opinion on this subject; and this whole country is standing still for the purpose of ascertaining what Congress is going to do.

What can business men do when the question is standing in this attitude? If we inflate the currency it affects the business of the country in one way. If we contract the currency, every sagacious business man knows it affects it in another and entirely opposite direction. What can the business man do but stand still until this Congress acts?

Now, sir, I say it is the highest duty we owe to the people of this country, and especially to the business men of this country, that whatever we are to do we shall do quickly. While we are halting here between these diverse opinions, while we are standing here squabbling as to whether we shall take up this measure or that measure, the business of the country is suffering. And I do not wonder, sir, that complaints are coming up from every part of the country and from men entertaining all classes of opinions to the Congress of the United States upon this question. I insist to-day it is our duty, our bounden duty, to ourselves and to the country to lay all other measures aside and take up this measure and settle it, so the people may go on intelligently about their business.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I only desire to say a few words. All gentlemen admit the great importance of the bill proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.] I think they will all admit the bill acted on the other day was a bill of equally great importance.

Now, did any hurt come from our not having any debate on that bill? Is there a man in this House who would likely have changed his vote if we had debated it for weeks?

The question is not now whether we shall go on with the currency bill—and I am in favor of it—but the question is whether we shall enter upon a limitless sea of talk. I am told there are fifty names down of men who are willing to talk on this subject of finance. If we can go on and have a vote on this subject let us say so, and so say all the members who want action.

But the people of the country want something done in order that it may not be perpetually afraid of this Congress. Every great business interest in the land is to-day afraid of the Senate and House of Representatives. Our sitting here from day to day is a constant menace to them because of the uncertainty of what we will do. They care little about our talk; it is only what we will do in reference to which they are concerned. If we can do something this morning I shall be exceedingly glad of it. Yet it is proposed now after we have waited for two weeks, after having made only two pages of progress in the legislative appropriation bill, we shall enter upon a sea of talk, not that we shall do any work; and I must at least ask the House to go forward with its business.

Gentlemen say that the appropriation bills will pass at all hazards. Yes, sir; but gentlemen should remember that every day you put off an appropriation bill you crowd the great appropriations of the year into the last heated days and nights of the session; and gentlemen have certainly no right to expect good legislation out of work done in that way. It is the calm, quiet, deliberate consideration of our appropriation bills, line by line, that will alone give us economical work that we can stand on before the country. And if this bill can be pushed over because it does not go into operation before July—that is the argument I have heard over and over again this session—then you can put them all over till the last week, and pass them in one lump vote. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to resume the consideration of the legislative, &c., appropriation bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I hope the House will vote that motion down.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before the question is put, I desire to say a single word. Not all of us in the House have the same high and lofty intuitions that distinguish the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. What seems so plain to him, and what he reaches by a single bound, many of us are obliged to reach by long, slow, and painful processes.

Now, as to appropriation bills, if this were the first time in the history of the Government that appropriations were to be made, there might be some force in what the gentleman says; but we have passed appropriation bills year after year, from the beginning of the Government, and we know something about them. But the question of the currency is the question, permit me to say, that is now most exercising and interesting the American people, and one upon which they expect and desire to hear from their Representatives. And I trust that the House, having the issue directly presented to them by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] will now decide, in view of that desire on the part of the people, whether they will take up the currency bill and go on with it at this time or not. If such is the wish of the House, they will vote down the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, and will take up the consideration of the currency bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make one suggestion to the House. And that is, if these two motions are to be daily in conflict they should be settled without debate. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] has charge of a bill which is absolutely entitled to consideration each day at half-past one o'clock, subject only to a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the appropriation bills. Let that be decided by the House promptly. Does the gentleman from Ohio insist on his motion?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do.

The question being taken on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill, there were—ayes 61, noes 93.

So the motion was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 2451) to improve the mouth of the Mississippi River.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 1762) concerning the practice in territorial courts and appeals therefrom.

CURRENCY AND FREE BANKING.

The SPEAKER. The House proceeds to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, I approach this discussion with diffidence and self-distrust. The subject is vast, complex, difficult—perplexing alike to the student of finance and the practical financier. While it presents much that is obvious and palpable, it conceals its governing laws, so subtile as hitherto to have eluded the keenest scrutiny. Hence the manifold theories, plans, schemes, methods, and systems, each perfect to the mind of its author, and of all who will listen to him, and to no one else. Blackwood remarks that "in currency there is no violation of common sense so gross but that hundreds of clever men are ready to swallow it." This is spoken of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. And it is a fair illustration of the estimate in which the supporters of one financial theory are generally held by the advocates of another theory. It is well if the imputations do not reach beyond the understanding of the opponent and call in question his motives.

Conscious that many will differ from me, both in reasons and conclusions, I shall, in what I am about to say, accord to them the same singleness of purpose as my own, with the possibility of wiser opinions.

The currency or circulating medium consists of money and credits based upon money and promising to pay it.

Money hardly admits of a definition which does not require to be still further defined. It belongs to the list of elemental things which all attempts to simplify serve only to obscure. By turns it has been called "the representative of value;" "the measure of value;" "the standard of value;" "the medium of exchanges." Bagehot says, "money is economical power." McCulloch, after enumerating various monetary functions, says, "now this commodity, whatever it may be, is money." All these are definitions of the theory, the abstract idea of money. Money in the concrete, as it exists in trade, and as we find it in the pocket, is described by Fullarton in these terms:

> Gold and silver coin pass current in exchange for all sorts of commodities, because gold and silver are themselves commodities of value, and furnish the buyer and seller with a convenient equivalent that is universally in demand. Inconvertible government notes, though valueless in themselves, acquire a value in exchange, as has been shown, from the conditions annexed to their emission, and by reason of that value are received in exchange for commodities precisely on the same principle as coin. These two descriptions of circulation, therefore, fall naturally under a common head; and the phrase "money" may by a fair analogy be applied equally to the one as to the other.—Fullarton on the Regulation of Currencies, London, 1844, page 36.

The truth is, money is the creation of law. That is money which the law declares to be money. To ordain it and regulate its value is one of the highest prerogatives of sovereign power. Under the Constitution this power is vested in Congress alone.

By the act of April 2, 1792, Congress established the money of account, the dollar and its decimals; and provided for the coinage of gold, silver, and copper. For nearly seventy years this continued to be the only money of the country. On the 25th of February, 1862, another act was passed authorizing the issue of United States notes, better known by the popular sobriquet of "greenbacks," and declaring them to be "lawful money, and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest" on the bonded debt. The constitutional validity of this act was seriously questioned both prior to its passage and subsequently; but it has been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, after deliberation as grave as ever question received in that august tribunal. (12 Wallace, 457.)

This money, resting upon the credit of the Government and the authority of her laws, has performed a most important part in our public affairs. It carried us in safety through the rebellion, and has protected our unexampled prosperity since; and when panic had stricken down private credit and suspended confidence between man and man, it was eagerly sought and cherished alike by the wealthiest banker and the humblest laborer. It is the same money in kind which gave England success in the peninsular campaigns and the crowning victory at Waterloo. The decision of the Supreme Court declaring its legality added to our military resources more than would a standing army of half a million men.

I fail to comprehend, much less to sympathize with, the criticism which censures the United States notes as so many tokens of a violated public faith. This criticism is made to hinge upon the "promise to pay" engraved upon their face, as though it were an undertaking to respond with gold or silver coin. The "promise" is to "pay dollars," money of account. It is not the form given them by the Secretary of the Treasury which determines their character, but the law of their issue, also stamped upon their face. The law, as we have seen, declares they "shall be receivable in payment of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States, except duties on imports, and of all claims and demands against the United States of any kind whatsoever, except for interest on bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin; and shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest, as aforesaid."

This they profess to be, nothing more, nothing less. This they are, and at all times have been; nothing more, nothing less. And they who argue repudiation, breach of faith, public dishonor, because they are not exchanged for coined metal at the demand of the holder, seem to me sorely straitened for reasons to support a favorite theory.

It is worthy of remark that a late English writer indulges in the same criticism precisely upon the notes of the Bank of England. He suggests instead a national currency, irredeemable, like the consols, and analogous in character to our own, which he pronounces "perfectly effective." He adds:

> Such a national currency, whatever defects may be imputed to it, would at least be an honest one. Its notes would not bear, on their face, like those of the Bank of England, the illusory promise and preposterous pretense of being payable in gold on demand.—The Bank-charter Act and the Rate of Interest, second edition, London, 1873, page 115.

I do not overlook the declaration by Congress in the act of March 18, 1869, to the effect that the faith of the Government is pledged to redeem the United States notes in coin "at the earliest practicable period." I shall recur to it. This, however, in nowise changes or affects their intrinsic original character.

Mr. POTTER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question at this point?

Mr. MAYNARD. Certainly.

Mr. POTTER. Do I understand the gentleman correctly as saying that notes of the Bank of England are not redeemable with coin on demand?

Mr. MAYNARD. I neither said the one thing nor the other. What I said was that an English writer, in treating of the currency of England, makes that criticism upon the Bank of England notes, and his process of reasoning is certainly plausible. I have not expressed any opinion of my own, either one way or the other. What I said was that the criticism we every day hear made upon our legal-tender notes is precisely the same criticism as is made by this English publicist on the notes of the Bank of England.

Mr. POTTER. But without any foundation. I want to say here, because it is a common error that notes of the Bank of England are a legal tender because redeemed in gold, that the moment the bank ceases to redeem in gold that moment they cease to be a legal tender.

Mr. MAYNARD. The writer referred to is not speaking of their legal-tender character, but of their actual, practical convertibility into gold and silver.

Mr. POTTER. They have been so redeemable ever since the suspension following the great Napoleonic war.

Mr. MAYNARD. That is a question I leave with my distinguished friend from New York and the English writer to settle between themselves, remarking that the criticism could not well be less sound than that to which I was referring, so often urged against our greenbacks.

So much for the money portion of our currency. The credit portion of it consists of the circulating notes of national banks, guaranteed to the holder by the United States and secured by a deposit in the Treasury of Government bonds. Except within narrow limits these notes are not a legal tender in the payment of private debts, or the satisfaction of judgments at law. Though the banks are authorized to issue and circulate them "as money," they are not money; they are simply "obligatory promissory notes, payable on demand" in money. And in addition to the guarantee of ultimate payment, the Government gives them further assurance by receiving and paying them for everything except duties on imports, interest on the public debt, and in redemption of the national currency. They are issued to the community only for value or on valid security; no one receiving them in private transactions but at his option, and because he is willing to give in exchange either value or valid security. Therefore just so many circulate as the business of the community finds it advantageous to use upon these terms, and no more. Any excess will be returned to the banks. Upon this financial hypothesis rests the present bill.

I mention the fractional currency only to indicate that it has not been pretermitted, but that in all estimates made this medium—amounting, with the nickels and coppers, to about fifty millions—will not be included. In like manner I mention the notes of the gold banks, the gold certificates, and the clearing-house certificates.

This, then, is our currency: United States notes, limited by the act of June 30, 1864, to $400,000,000, and national-bank notes limited by the acts of June 3, 1864, and July 12, 1870, to $354,000,000.

After the late hostilities the Treasury Department inaugurated a policy of retiring the United States notes. Congress interposed a limitation to the contraction by the act of February 12, 1866, and by the act of February 4, 1868, after forty-four millions had been retired, suspended it altogether. The legal status of these forty-four millions of retired notes we are not called upon to determine judicially. As a legislative question, my opinion of it is embodied in a proviso to the third section of the present bill, and I distrust it only because it has been controverted by so many whose opinions I have been accustomed to respect.

The amount of United States notes issued, and now outstanding, is, or was at the beginning of this month, $381,715,437. The national-bank notes may be stated at $349,000,000, making together $730,715,437. Some arguments assume this last amount to be in actual circulation, and deduce the conclusion that the currency is redundant, inflated. Such, however, is not the fact.

It will be recollected that the national banks in certain designated cities are required to keep on hand at all times, in lawful money, as a reserve, "at least 25 per cent. of the aggregate amount of circulating notes and deposits," and the banks at all other places a like reserve of 15 per cent. According to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, the banks held on the 12th of September last, in national-bank notes, United States notes, and deposit certificates representing United States notes in the Treasury, an aggregate, in round numbers, of $130,000,000. To this sum should be added the notes of the several banks remaining in their respective vaults, not enumerated in the foregoing sum, $10,000,000; making $140,000,000 withheld from circulation by the national banks alone at the exigency of the law. The amount of reserves held by private banks, savings-banks, insurance and trust companies, not included in the national-bank reserves, cannot be, certainly ought not to be, less than $100,000,000. In the Treasury, and with officials in transitu to the Treasury—in the custody of the Treasury—the constant balance may be stated at $10,000,000; and in the several State, county, city, and town treasuries, including moneys deposited in court to abide judicial investigation, as much more; making $20,000,000 of currency withheld from circulation by the different agencies of the Government.

Then we must not forget that the circulation is debited at the Treasury with all the notes issued and not returned, taking no account of destruction and loss. There have been issued of United States notes alone, first and last, $915,420,031. Twelve years have elapsed since the issue was authorized; three of them years of dreadful war, and the notes, very many of them, in the hands of the soldiers. The liability of notes to destruction and loss increases with the distance of their circulation from the point of issue, and especially when there is no redemption to call them home. The notes of local banks, never many miles from the counter, and always redeemable on demand, nevertheless disappear and do not return, as every banker knows. These considerations induce the belief that an annual loss of 1 per cent. on the amount actually outstanding and in circulation is not an overestimate. Taking the United States notes and the national-bank notes together, the loss has been computed at five millions a year for ten years, or $50,000,000 total, is considerable. The loss, whatever it is, inures to the benefit of the Government.

We have not taken into account the private hoards, known to be considerable, especially in localities remote from banks. An intelligent and well-informed gentleman testified before your Committee on Banking and Currency, from what he regarded reliable data, that the private hoards in the cotton-growing States alone, held both by the white and colored, would exceed $200,000,000. That a considerable amount is so held secretly and in small sums, wholly unavailable for business and commerce, I am fully persuaded.

The amount of currency actually in circulation and accessible to those wishing to obtain it for value or upon valid security is stated quite generally at $500,000,000. My own belief, founded on reasons just given, is that $300,000,000 is near the truth.

Much or little, we must determine whether there is enough. On this point, no doubt, we can derive much valuable aid from the deductions of economic science; the a priori reasonings of the publicists and eminent thinkers. Your Committee on Banking and Currency were not slow to avail themselves of this assistance, and hope at an early day to present a body of information thus derived for the use of the House.

Meantime I invite attention to certain facts not above the level certainly of the unscientific mind. The business of the country requiring currency more or less to transact, so far as I know, has not been tabulated in figures; I doubt if it could be. We can approximate it by conjecture. The clearing-house exchanges in six cities, for the year ending the 1st of October last, were forty-one billions, nearly twenty times the national debt, as follows:

Boston	2,674,493,555
Philadelphia	1,700,000,000
Saint Louis	997,584,620
Chicago	963,060,503
Cincinnati	746,587,322
Total	41,054,699,962

This list does not include the large cities of Baltimore, New Orleans, and Louisville, nor numerous smaller ones, whose annual business is very great; and the figures cover only those transactions which are conducted on bank deposits, and do not include those which are cash in hand. Statistical people give the annual production of the country at eight billions, three-fourths of which, or six billions, pass from the producer to the consumer, by I know not how many intermediate operations. How much actual currency—ready money—is required for this enormous traffic I have not considered. Doubtless bank and individual credit is the chief instrumentality. Once more: It is not an extravagant estimate, I would fain believe, that there are constantly employed in the United States one million of persons, at an average daily wage of $2.50. Their weekly pay-roll foots up fifteen millions, or sixty millions for the month, to be paid cash in hand. These persons are scattered all over the country, and the money must be carried to them, and seldom appears in clearing-house exchanges.

This is enough surely to awaken a suspicion that more currency of some kind is wanted. Of course I shall not be understood as meaning the wants of the impecunious, the improvident, or the insolvent; but the wants of business men to carry forward their business on strictly business principles, who never ask a dollar which they cannot profitably use in their business, and for which they do not stand ready to give value or valid security.

In the autumn of 1871 an adventurous young broker of New York threw that city well-nigh into convulsions by collecting and withdrawing from circulation a few millions of currency. Congress ordered an investigation, which resulted in no measure to prevent the repetition of the same thing with similar consequences. Can it be justly said that the currency is redundant or sufficient, even when it is in the power of any one man to create an artificial stringency considerable enough to affect the community?

Again, in 1872, a scarcity of money was felt, which was relieved by using a few millions of the so-called reserve, about which so much was said in Congress and out of it.

The panic of September and October, 1873, is too recent to be dwelt upon. The Secretary of the Treasury tells us that during the summer, in anticipation of a stringency in the autumn, he had accumulated in the Treasury a surplus of about fourteen millions in currency; that with this he purchased bonds to the amount of about thirteen millions between the 20th and 24th of September. The New York clearing-house issued some twenty-six millions of certificates, to be used by the banks in settling balances. The clearing-house reserve deposits in the Treasury were reduced from $32,240,000, on the 1st of September, to $8,875,000 on the last of October. The three items alone amount to sixty-two millions added to the volume of the currency to meet the demands of that exigent period.

The unvarying testimony from all parts of the country is to a deficiency of available cash. It was not to be had. No securities could command it. The rate of interest sounded like the last shriek of despair. Whatever opinions prevail as to the cause and origin of the panic, or as to the true method of preventing another, all agree that money was lacking; and there is a pretty general agreement that had the possible supply of money been without limit, the Secretary's paltry fourteen millions would have more than sufficed to meet every demand. It was because of the known limit that men in their terror clutched every dollar they could reach, and held it.

I infer, therefore, that there are times when more currency is required; how much, to be determined by the general activity of business, the state of trade, the schemes of the money-dealers, the confidence of the people, and perhaps other circumstances equally beyond calculation. To determine by legislative enactment the exact figure, thus far and no farther, is sheer empiricism. Yet this is the present state of things, and as a consequence the currency lacks self-adjustment to the varied and ever-varying wants of the country. Elasticity is the accepted term.

It is worthy of remark that the quality of the currency is eminently satisfactory to the general public. On every hand we hear it said that we now have the best currency ever known in the land, and we know it to be the truth. The oldest man alive can remember nothing comparable to it. During the panic men hoarded it as they hoard gold; and they still hoard it. The dissatisfied may be reduced to three classes: foreign traders; those whose affairs are improved by the relative increase in the value of money; and the sentimental advocates of specie payments, who can assign no reason beyond a theory. All others are more than contented—they are pleased. And were the present system seriously disturbed, they would be apt to demand the reason why. Gold and silver can be dispensed with, not greenbacks.

In providing for a possible increase of the currency, shall it be in United States notes or in national-bank notes? I have already touched upon the difference in the character of these two forms of circulation. I will enlarge. In the hands of a private citizen a ten-dollar United States note and a ten-dollar national-bank note are so nearly alike that he would take no trouble to exchange the one for the other. Trace them back to the source of issue, and we find the one issued in the payment of a debt, the other as a loan. For the one there is no existing commercial equivalent, for the other there remains some form of substantial value. It is as if one should hold two promissory notes of the same amount, one given for a hotel bill, the other for a bale of merchandise. Again, one is technically money, the other only a promise to pay money; in short, one is but a promise to pay the other. The United States notes are, in fact, a popular loan to the Government; not a forced loan as is sometimes offensively said, but a voluntary loan made by the people through their chosen representatives; the national-bank notes are a loan by the banks to the people. And the question whether the increase of the currency should be in United States notes or national-bank notes is the question; whether the people shall be called on for a further loan, or shall be enabled to borrow.

I cannot conceal from myself the conviction that the United States notes are a perilous issue, and to be resorted to only in grave emergencies. The temptation will always be very great to remit taxes and to pay the expenses of the Government in money costing nothing but the printing. I need not say how fatal such a policy would be to the public credit, nor how essential, even from the lowest point of unenlightened selfishness, to maintain the public credit above suspicion. Considerations of this kind induced Congress, by the act of June 30, 1864, to pledge the faith of the nation that the total amount of United States notes "issued or to be issued" should never exceed four hundred millions, and by that of March 18, 1869, "to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin." These pledges were deemed wise and proper when made; but, whether wise or unwise, it is too late now to inquire. They have been made, and they must be kept in their true spirit. Let them stand as the words of him that sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not.

The first pledge is negative, and there can be no excuse to break it. It must not be broken. The other is declaratory of a policy rather than a specific undertaking. It was then the policy, it is now the policy, to redeem the United States notes in coin, and to do it "at the earliest practicable period." Nobody understood, nobody now understands, that they were to be exchanged for coin as soon as four hundred millions of coin could be collected. This might have been done, no doubt, in a very few months. An active political canvass had occurred the preceding season. The public debt had been an important issue. The people had been appealed to whether the bonds should be paid, principal as well as interest, in coin, and the greenbacks should be redeemed; or the bonds paid in greenbacks and the greenbacks left to take care of themselves, to use one of the modes of statement. The decision was unequivocally in favor of the coin standard, and the new Congress embodied the result in one of its first acts, the act of March 18, 1869. The difference at that time between United States notes and coin was 31 per cent. It is now less than 12 per cent. As soon as the ravages of the war have been repaired and the surplus of production over consumption begins to accumulate, so as to produce a favorable balance in the general trade, including the payment of interest, gold will flow into the country, or, what is the same thing, remain in the country, and without disturbance or inconvenience will form the basis of domestic as well as of foreign exchanges. We shall undoubtedly reach specie payments; but as a commercial result, and not a legislative enactment.

Arguments have been drawn from the experience of Great Britain. She resumed without effort or embarrassment in May, 1821, after a suspension of more than twenty-four years. The trade balance all this time was in her favor. The efflux of gold had gone to maintain her wars and to support her allies. When peace returned, this outflow ceased, gold accumulated by her commerce, and specie payments were not only natural but necessary.

Meantime why should we be impatient? Let causes operate. For the overwhelming mass of our traffic, the internal traffic, the currency we have is just as valuable as gold, or as it would be if convertible into gold. I will venture to quote once more from an English author already cited:

> That as far as concerns our domestic exchanges, all the monetary functions which are usually performed by gold and silver coins may be performed as effectually by a circulation of inconvertible notes, having no value but that factitious and conventional value which they derive from the law, is a fact which admits, I conceive, of no denial. Values of this description may be made to answer all the purposes of intrinsic value, and supersede even the necessity for a standard, provided only the quantity of the issues be kept under due limitation.
> A plate of brass, a piece of leather, a scrap of water-marked paper, are things without any worth in themselves which can qualify them to perform the office of equivalents in the transactions of commerce; but stamp any of these articles with an inimitable mark, issue them in defined numbers for a valuable consideration, call them money, let them be received in payment of all public taxes and dues, and make it imperative by law on every man to provide himself with enough of this money for the discharge of all obligations incident to the common dealing of society, and you invest it at once with a value in exchange, wholly independent of its intrinsic properties, and bearing an exact ratio to the demand which you create for it. Of this description are the Government paper currencies of the continent, which in almost no instance derive any portion of their credit from the expectation that they will be ultimately discharged in coin. Of this description were the issues of the Bank of England during the continuance of the bank restriction act, for that measure was equivalent to an absolute discarding of the standard.—Fullarton, page 21.

We can afford to wait, and wait patiently, for our currency to ripen into specie, as it certainly will in the fullness of time, and not before. And until that time we shall have to depend upon the banks to complete our currency supply. Banks have always been unpopular, and probably always will be, for the simple reason that more is always expected of them than they can safely perform. The owner of a valuable tract of land half paid for cannot understand why the bank upon the whole, for security, will not loan him enough to pay the other half. And when the same bank loans a small trader twice the sum to purchase his crop in a depressed state of the prices, he at once sees collusion and a "ring" to profit by his necessities. You cannot satisfy him that his note for land is not a great deal better than his neighbor's for grain on the way to market.

Much of this popular odium arises, I am persuaded, from a misconception of the true functions of banks, and an inattention to the parts performed, relatively, by cash and by credit. Ricardo was the first, I believe, to take the distinction between capital and deposits, and to explain that so long as the banker uses his own money he is a capitalist, and that his proper function as a banker begins as soon as he begins to use the money of others. But capital and deposits combined are very inconsiderable, compared with bank credits as they have developed since Ricardo's time.

I have already referred to the enormous exchanges in the New York clearing-house. An intelligent banker of that city expressed to the Committee on Banking and Currency that the business they represent did not require exceeding 5 per cent. of the whole amount in cash; all the rest is credit. His language was:

> Mr. BUELL. What you assume may be correct, but no man can tell how much currency we do want. The proportion of currency to checks, bills of exchange, &c., used in commerce, is so small that few people conceive of it. We use in New York about 5 per cent. currency. In smaller towns they use 10 per cent., in still smaller places, from 15 to 25, and when you get back to the agricultural districts it requires 50 per cent. or more. The other 95 per cent. of the commercial transactions of New York City are moved by checks, bills of exchange, &c.
> The CHAIRMAN. Does the 5 per cent. cover the shopping and money transactions, hotel bills, &c.?
> Mr. BUELL. Yes; it all comes to a point in the banks through the clearing-house exchanges. Take your own experience, or that of a merchant who pays $50,000 by checks in a day, and not more than $100 for cash disbursements, personal expenses, &c. The volume of currency being so variable, used as it is in conjunction with checks, bills of exchange, &c., it is impossible to tell how much is required. The only way to measure it is by having practical redemption. When it is not wanted let it go back to the issuer; and when it is wanted it will come out and do its work, and again retire.

Some years ago Sir John Lubbock, an English banker, analyzed nineteen millions sterling received by the banking house of Messrs. Robartes & Co., and found that ½ of 1 per cent. consisted of coin, 2½ per cent. of bank-notes, and the other 97 per cent. of checks and bills of credit.

To illustrate: A, a New York cotton-dealer, has his note at thirty days, for $10,000, discounted and placed to his credit, subject to his draft, as a deposit. The books of the bank show discounts, $10,000; deposits, $10,000. So far, not a dollar in money has been used. A slip of paper and a few figures in the ledger are all. A next telegraphs to his correspondent in Memphis to ship him overland two hundred bales of cotton and to draw on him at sight. In a few days the draft comes, through a mercantile house, where it has paid for a bill of goods, and is met by A's check upon his bank deposit. There have been some four transactions, each for $10,000. At length the cotton arrives and A sells it to a Lowell manufacturer, who pays in another check, with which A pays his original note, and so, as far as he is concerned, the operation ends.

All the exchanges, first and last, added together would probably foot up $100,000, and no cash whatever has intervened. The freight, insurance, and discount, not estimated, may have been paid in cash or by still other drafts. The substantial business done consists of two hundred bales of cotton transported from Memphis to Lowell, and an invoice of merchandise from New York to Memphis, and all by means of the impalpable agent, bank credit.

Another illustration for which I am indebted to my associate on the committee, the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARWELL:] B, a grain-dealer of New York, goes to Chicago for a cargo of wheat, without money, but well accredited for business skill and integrity. He arranges with a banker there to honor his checks until he can collect the cargo; purchases, and ships to New York. He returns to the banker, with the bill of lading, substitutes for his checks a draft upon his consignee, and goes his way. He has not handled a dollar of currency; a cargo of grain has moved one thousand miles by the force of bank credit alone.

I have said enough, more than enough, perhaps, to convey my impression of the part assigned to banks in the traffic of the country. Their importance cannot well be overstated. They are coeval with modern commerce, and the farther we recede from the days of barter, strong boxes, and fortified cities and castles, the more artificial and complex, as well as efficient, does the system become. We might as well attempt to dispense with the printing-press, the power-loom, the spinning-jenny, the railroad, the telegraph, petroleum, and fossil coal, as business agents, as to dispense with banks. It is waste of time to talk about it.

Be our effort, then, to organize them upon a sound basis and on correct principles. If any people ever suffered more than ours in former times from a bad system of banking, it has escaped my reading. The old State-bank system, which flourished with uncontrolled vigor for a period of twenty-five years before the war, was about as vicious as can well be conceived. Some of the banks were certainly much better than others; but none of them had credit enough to carry their notes two degrees of latitude from their isothermal lines. Created by thirty different State Legislatures, without responsibility, subjected to no supervision, their notes dignified with the name of money, and limited in amount only by their power to keep them in circulation, interested in their depreciation, the sport of the counterfeiter, without mutuality with each other, and despotic to a degree, they exhibited the most remarkable financial spectacle of modern times. The Bank-note Reporter and Counterfeit Detector was a vade mecum with every business man; and the varied and ever-varying volume of the hundreds of different issues was a perpetual study. That a great commercial people, active and practical like the American people, should have gone on from year to year, without an effort for something better, is only another proof how much will be borne by the long-suffering public rather than incur the trouble of making a change.

The system known as the Suffolk bank system answered well enough, perhaps, for New England; the free-banking system of New York, Ohio, and several other States furnished the model on which was built the present national-bank system. The ineradicable defect in them all was, they lacked what Mr. Webster felicitously called the odor of nationality. They were local, and their issues, therefore, wholly unfit for the commerce of the country.

The Scotch banking system has been much admired. For the work it had to do, having regard to the limited extent of the country, the character of the population and their pursuits, I incline to believe it was nearer perfect than any other ever devised. The circulation was exclusively paper. If I am not mistaken—if I am there are gentlemen in the House who can correct me—there had never been a financial panic in that country prior to Mr. Peel's celebrated bank charter act of 1844, which considerably modified their financial system. Since that time panics have occurred in Scotland. Fullarton has left a sketch of the Scotch banks, as they were prior to 1844, the time when he writes, to which I venture to invite the attention of the House and the country:

> The Scotch banks, among whom this practice of allowing interest to depositors has been coeval with their existence, are in themselves a standing refutation of the notion that bank-notes can be overissued at the pleasure of the issuers. In Scotland the amount of capital employed in banking was nearly doubled between 1826 and 1840; and such has been the multiplication of branches, that it is computed there is now in that division of the kingdom either a bank or the branch of a bank for every six thousand souls. Almost every person in Scotland above the lowest grade in society employs a banker, and the deposits bearing interest in the hands of the bankers were estimated by Mr. Blair in 1841 at the astonishing sum of between twenty-six and twenty-seven millions sterling, or about ten times the amount of the circulation. Scotland uses no gold. All her exchanges of purchase and sale to the value of one pound or upward are performed by book-transfers or bank-notes, two-thirds of the whole bank-note issue being taken up in performing the offices of gold. But what has been the effect of all this keen competition of bankers and multiplication of banking transactions on the amount of the circulation of Scotland? Why, the result has been that the gross bank-note currency of Scotland, as compared with the population, gives a ratio of only one pound sterling per man, instead of two pounds, which is the proportion in England; and that, if you deduct the Scotch one-pound notes, which correspond with the English metallic currency, the ratio will be nearly as one to six. It is held for an undisputed dogma by many, that an unrestricted currency of paper, from which the use of the precious metals is practically excluded, must, of all currencies, have the most decided tendency to keep up prices; and it is also a maxim at least equally orthodox, that the smaller the amount of a currency in proportion to the stock of commodities to be distributed, the lower must the scale of prices inevitably be. Grant only these two postulates, and it will be equally easy to prove, as you may have a mind, that Scotland must be the dearest or the cheapest country in the world; for there certainly exists no country whose exchanges are performed so exclusively through the instrumentality of paper, nor any in which the same extent of business, or anything like it, is transacted with so exceedingly small a proportion of circulating medium, though that medium is composed exclusively of bank-notes.
> I have never heard, however, that the range of prices in Scotland is, on the whole, materially higher or lower than in other parts of the United Kingdom. Indeed, the dearest country, perhaps, in Europe is Holland, where the circulation is entirely metallic.—Fullarton, page 92.

There are several points in this statement worthy of consideration:

1. That interest is paid on deposits.
2. That coin is practically excluded from the circulation.
3. That bank-notes cannot be issued in excess of the business wants of the community.
4. That an indefinite multiplication of banks and branches works convenience, and not mischief.
5. That the increase of banks diminishes the per capita ratio of circulation; the people using the banks instead of carrying money in their pockets.
6. A paper currency has no effect per se to inflate prices.

I come now to speak of our national banking system. The history of it is familiar to several gentlemen now in the House and in the other wing of the Capitol. It came into existence in 1862, as parcel of the financial measures of the war, usually attributed to Mr. Chase, and not without much reason. As a member of the Committee on Ways and Means at that time, I had opportunity for observation. That eminent statesman, as I have the best assurances, regarded the national banking system as a permanent feature; the United States notes as a temporary resource. I have always esteemed it a misfortune to the country, as well as to his own fame, that he retired from the Treasury before he had given completion to his scheme of finance. He believed that the national banks would be one of the compensations of the war. It certainly requires no very great sagacity to discern several points in which they are incomparably superior to any pre-existing banks in the country.

While they are national in the credit of their circulation and in their amenability to Federal control, they nevertheless are so distributed over the country as to furnish local facilities, which a single institution like the Bank of England or the Bank of France could not do.

Their circulation is perfectly secure to the holder. Loss by the ordinary casualties, or by anything short of revolution or breach of public faith, is impossible. He may be said literally to have taken a bond of fate. The value and importance of this feature in a currency can be understood only by those who, in former times, saw infuriated mobs gather at the doors of a broken or breaking bank.

Closely allied to this feeling of security is the assurance derived from the official examinations and reports required to be made of the condition and the dealings of each bank. Like the ringing of the car-wheels under the stroke of the test-hammer, at the stopping of the train, they denote a man on the watch. Admit that in some instances the examinations have been partial, and the reports unwarranted, that failures have occurred with loss to depositors, it only proves an imperfect administration of the law, and not a defect in the law itself. That the public interest requires all banking to be rigidly watched, and that no bank is safe which is not subjected to such oversight, are propositions I do not propose to discuss.

A very important part of the system is that which requires the capital to be invested in Government bonds, thus retaining in the country many millions of the semi-annual interest. I know it is the commonly received doctrine that it matters not whether we pay the interest on our public debt at home or abroad. If paid abroad, we have in exchange the use of so much foreign capital. Some, indeed, hold it true economy to negotiate foreign loans when practicable. Such, for some years past, seems to have been the policy of the Treasury. I cannot think so. To my mind it were better to pay 6 per cent. at home than 4, or even 3, abroad. Paid at home, it is as it were changed from the right hand to the left; abroad it is subtracted from the sum total of our wealth.

Suppose two billions of our public debt funded in 3 per cent. fifty-year bonds, held in Europe. The productive industry of the country would in effect be mortgaged to Europe for the next half-century to meet a burden of sixty millions a year—three billions to meet what goes by the name of interest. A different policy prevailed during the war. Congress steadily refused to authorize a foreign loan. Consequently we were saved the humiliation of seeing our bonds hawked in an unwilling market, and at the close of the war nearly all, except a few in Germany, were held by own citizens. Unfortunately, as it seems to me, the interest had been made payable in gold, and that hurried them over the water. Had the act of February 25, 1862, gone into the statute-book as it passed the House, making both customs dues and interest on the public debt payable in United States notes, we should have built fewer railroads and palaces perhaps, but I am persuaded our financial condition would have been much stronger, and we should now have been much nearer the El Dorado of specie payments.

Kellogg, who wrote more than a quarter of a century ago, illustrates the effect of paying interest abroad in a passage which I crave permission to quote:

Suppose an uncultivated island, ten miles square, and a few miles distant from the coast of the United States. Ten thousand wealthy citizens of the States intend to build a city upon it. These citizens are worth $150,000 each; in the aggregate $1,500,000,000. The legal interest on money is fixed at 6 per cent. per annum. For two years previous to their removal to the island the people prepare upon it houses for themselves and suitable accommodations for merchants and mechanics. Each of these families expends $3,000 yearly for its support. Each family being worth $150,000, the interest on which at 6 per cent. would be $9,000, each has an income of $6,000 a year over and above expenses. They expend their surplus income for two years, i. e., $12,000 for each family, in the aggregate $120,000,000, in making improvements upon the island. They dispose of their property on the mainland on credit, securing it by bonds and mortgages, State stocks, or otherwise, so that they insure an interest of 6 per cent. per annum on the whole amount of their property, payable half-yearly. These obligations merely represent the value of the property they leave upon the mainland, and must yield an income from the products of the land and of the labor of the purchasers. The annual interest on $1,500,000,000 amounts to $90,000,000. The paper obligations held by the creditors legally empower them to demand an interest of $90,000,000 in specie. The mere giving of obligations is all that is required in the transfer of property. The conversion of their property into bonds and mortgages and other securities may not have required the use of a million dollars of money. But the payment of both principal and interest must be made in money.

The ten thousand families contain, on an average, five persons each, making in the aggregate a population of fifty thousand. They employ, on an average, three domestics in each family, increasing the population to eighty thousand. The yearly expenses of each family amount to $3,000; or for the whole, to $30,000,000. Hatters, tailors, shoemakers, cabinet-makers, mechanics of every sort, collect about them to supply their wants, and receive the sums which they expend in living. More than fifty thousand laborers and artisans are needed to supply their wants. In a few years the concentration of capital collects a city of three or four hundred thousand inhabitants. They expend $30,000,000 yearly, and draw besides from the people of the mainland a clear income of $60,000,000 a year, which they can reloan. The debtors cannot send the $60,000,000 in money, and are therefore obliged to send the products of the soil, manufactured articles, &c., to this city for sale, to procure money to meet their payments of interest. The city soon becomes the market-place of the nation, and engrosses the principal business. The people are astonished at its wealth and prosperity, and congratulate themselves on having so fine a market for their products.—Labor and Other Capital, section 2.

Remove the island three thousand miles away and call it England; the hypothesis of the last generation becomes the history of this. Any policy, therefore, which promises to keep our bonds at home, or to bring them home—I say bring, not send—ought in my judgment to be encouraged.

I have said that our national-bank system is substantially the same in principle which prevailed prior to the war, in New York and several other States. The principle antedates this period in our banking system. It underlies the Bank of England, since its reorganization under the charter of 1844. The act of 1844, rechartering the bank, although chiefly promoted by Sir Robert Peel, is understood to have been framed also under the counsels of Mr. Lloyd, afterward created Lord Overstone. Certainly, the leading features of the act, and especially the separation of the bank into two departments, the issue department and the banking department, are sketched in a publication of his as early as 1837. He notices the diverse functions of a bank of issue and of a bank of discount and deposit; and gives us the reasons why the difference between them is not observed by "those who take only a superficial view" of financial questions, that both functions were performed by the same hands, in the same establishment, designated by the common term "bank."

He then proceeds:

Can it be necessary, however, to point out to those who have really reflected upon these subjects the essential difference which exists between these two functions? A difference which not only renders them perfectly distinct from each other, but in many respects of so conflicting a nature that it seems hardly possible that the administration of the two can be safely confided to the same hands.

A bank of issue is intrusted with the creation of the circulating medium.

A bank of deposit and discount is concerned only with the use, distribution, or application of that circulating medium.

The sole duty of the former is to take efficient means for issuing its paper money upon good security, and regulating the amount of it by one fixed rule.

The principal object and business of the latter is to obtain the command of as large a proportion as possible of the existing circulating medium, and to distribute it in such manner as shall combine security for payment with the highest rate of profit.

That these two functions are perfectly separate and distinct, and that there is no connection between them which renders it necessary that they should be administered by the same parties, is clear.—Reflections on Mr. J. Horsley Palmer's Pamphlet, 1837, page 42.

The bank-charter act of 1844 created two departments at the Bank of England: one, the bank itself, a bank in every respect identical with any other bank; the second, an office of the state—the state as an issuer of notes—with which the bank and its directors have no more to do than any other person in England.

In the first place, on the basis of a debt of fourteen millions sterling, due by the government to the bank, notes were issued to that amount; then notes were issued in exchange for gold deposited for their redemption, and upon these notes the business of the bank was and is conducted.

The identity of principle in the Bank of England and our national-bank system is obvious. At the head of our issue department is the Comptroller of the Currency, who issues circulating notes having the public debt for their basis. Our banking department, instead of being restricted to a single establishment at the chief money center, like the institution in Threadneedle street, is distributed over the country among two thousand separate establishments, each under its own direction; in other respects the same.

The limitation upon the amount of the currency is a feature common to both systems. In Mr. Lloyd's plan it is as distinct as in our national banking act. And upon his theory all monetary disturbances causing an unusual demand for coin and an outflow of the precious metals were to be met by contracting the circulation and raising the rate of interest; in other words, by depressing the price of labor and of all the productions of labor. Of course he was making no provision against panics and financial crises. These he seems to have regarded as the necessary incidents of commerce, to be foreseen but not averted. No fatalist ever looked upon doom with more composure. His words read like an utterance from the Book of Fate:

The history of what we are in the habit of calling the "state of trade" is an instructive lesson. We find it subject to various conditions which are periodically returning; it revolves apparently in an established cycle. First, we find it in a state of quiescence—next improvement—growing confidence—prosperity—excitement—overtrading—convulsion—pressure—stagnation—distress—ending again in quiescence.—Reflections, &c., page 44.

If this be true, it is very discouraging. And yet this is the theory on which rest all limitations of the circulating medium, and on which is based the financial policy that at this moment cries aloud in our streets for "contraction."

A common objection to the national banking system is that it creates monopolies. Our conceptions of monopoly may be enlarged, perhaps, by learning that there are two thousand in the land in active competition with each other. We have in our day had banks which were monopolies in the true sense of the word, wielding chartered privileges denied to everybody else. This objection, however, whether well taken or not, is entirely removed by this bill. At present no bank can receive more than $500,000 of circulating notes, and the total issue of notes, as we have seen, cannot exceed $354,000,000. Within these limits banking is at the option of all alike who will comply with the requirements of the law. By this bill those limitations are repealed and the privileges of the law, such as they are, left subject to no restriction.

But in the practical working of the system as we find it there is, in my opinion, cause of complaint much more serious. Whether from superior diligence, a keener foresight, a better luck, or all combined, the Eastern and Middle States have absorbed by far the larger portion of the circulating notes allowed by the law to be issued. The six Eastern States have $110,489,966. The five Middle States, including the District of Columbia, have $126,138,230. The nine Western States have $78,785,148. The fourteen Southern and Southwestern States have barely $36,630,217, less than either Pennsylvania, New York, or Massachusetts. The Eastern and Middle States combined have $236,628,196, while all the rest of the entire country has less than $118,000,000; and of this latter sum the vast South has considerably less than one-third.

This inequality has attracted the attention of Congress, and there have been several enactments to correct it. The last was the act of July 12, 1870, authorizing the emission of fifty-four millions additional, to be distributed in the States having less than their proportion, and requiring the Comptroller of the Currency to withdraw twenty-five millions from the States holding an excess and to make of this sum a similar distribution. That officer holds that the fifty-four millions have not yet "been taken up," and therefore he has made no requisition on existing banks to return the twenty-five millions. Though compelled to think him highly technical in his construction of the law, I am not prepared to urge a want of good faith. This, then, is the state of things: a large excess in the Middle and East, especially in the East, and a deficiency throughout the whole South and West. The apportionment of the Eastern States is less than forty millions; she holds an excess of more than seventy millions. On the other hand, the South holds of circulating notes but $36,630,217; her deficiency is $51,271,034.

To descend to particulars: the apportionment of Maine is less than five millions, her circulation over eight millions; of Massachusetts nineteen and a quarter millions, her circulation fifty-nine and a half millions; of Rhode Island two and three-quarter millions, her circulation thirteen and a quarter millions; of Connecticut seven millions, her circulation eighteen millions.

Now turn southward. Virginia, entitled to over eight millions of circulation, has less than four millions; North Carolina, entitled to six and one-half millions, has less than two millions; Georgia, entitled to over seven millions, has less than two and one-half millions, and so on through the entire South, until we come to Missouri entitled to fifteen and one-half millions, yet put off with less than six and one-half millions.

The circulation of New York is over two and one-half millions in excess of her proportion; in Pennsylvania the excess is nearly three and one-half millions. These two sums united are little more than the deficiency in my own State. But—and here is the discouraging feature in our case—when I seek to bring into this Hall a measure, looking not to the taking from Pennsylvania aught that she now enjoys, but to giving my constituents an equal chance to meet the demands of their trade, I am met at the outer door by my associate, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] lance in hand, shouting at the top of his voice, "A bill of abominations!" Doubtless he thinks so; perhaps his constituents think so. My constituents as well as myself are of a different opinion.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. DANFORD in the chair.) The gentleman's hour has expired.

Mr. FORT. I move that the time of the gentleman be extended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is moved that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee be extended. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MAYNARD. I thank the House for its courtesy. I shall endeavor not to trespass on it too far.

As matters now stand we are absolutely helpless. Not a solitary bank-note can be added to our scanty supply, how great soever our business necessities or the amount of our capital. Even if we could inveigle the twenty-five millions refund, that would not supply one-half the deficiency in the South alone, with no competitive demand from the West. The Eastern and Middle States—reckoning Ohio with the Middle States, where she properly belongs—with almost three-fourths of the entire bank circulation of the country in their vaults, are naturally quite contented. And when the rest of the country puts in a modest claim for its embarrassed industries; its fields of unpicked cotton; its droves awaiting transportation to market; its grain yet in the garner; the labor of its springing manufactories unpaid, and therefore unfed, gentlemen here cry "inflation," "expansion," "specie payments;" and the cry is re-echoed by the newspaper press of Philadelphia, of New York, the plethoric East, with a small screech from Cincinnati. Bad as our condition is, they aggravate it by offering to receive our securities, and to loan us any surplus they may chance to have at the moderate rate of 10 per cent., and 12½ per cent. added for commissions. But when we attempt to bring forward a measure that will put us in a way to supply our own deficiency, they confront us, as they did a few weeks since, with a solid adverse vote.

The science people tell us much about the ratio of currency to population. Figuring the entire amount of United States notes and bank-notes ever issued from the Treasury and not returned to it, and assuming that they are all still in existence and in actual circulation, they make out nearly seventeen dollars for each man, woman, and child in the United States, which they demonstrate to their own satisfaction is many dollars in excess of sound finance. And they, these scientists from New York and beyond, put forward the statement not only as if it were perfectly true, but perfectly fair. Now let us see "how the old thing works." Leaving out of account the United States notes, and restricting the inquiry to bank-notes alone, we find that Connecticut has $33.48 per head for her population; Massachusetts has $40.84 per head, and Rhode Island $61.59 per head. Need we wonder that the Representatives from these States vote solid against anything portending a change! I must except one Representative from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and he the most abused man in it, if not in the country. These sagacious gentlemen understand when their constituents have a good thing, and very naturally wish them to keep it. I do not reproach them. Verily they shall have their reward. Turning now to the South, and taking all the fourteen Southern States, from Virginia to Missouri, and counting their population, they have of bank-notes $2.59 per head. Kentucky, at the top of the list, has $5.78 per head; Missouri has $3.76 per head; Virginia $3.18 per head; and my own State $2.66! And this, be it never forgotten, is all, as the law now stands and is administered, we can possibly have. The West has fared a little better; but she is by no means full-handed. Her bank-note circulation, omitting Ohio, is but $6.13 per head of her population.

Now, be it understood, once for all, that I do not propose, this bill does not propose, to take one dollar from the bank circulation of either the Middle or the Eastern States. I am not aware that they have too much. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] assured us the other day that the eighteen millions held in that enterprising State was not excessive. Indeed, he rather left the contrary impression that it was hardly enough, at times, certainly; and such is my belief. And from Rhode Island comes a memorial, signed by the officers of thirty-two national banks, presented to the House on successive days by the entire delegation from that busy State, praying the repeal of the law withdrawing a portion of their circulation, and protesting against further legislation to carry that law into effect.

They declare:

> The very large and varied manufacturing and mechanical industries in this State require for their successful promotion all the banking facilities which the State now has. To contract any part of the circulation would directly diminish the value of money resources, enhance the value of currency necessarily required for the weekly payment of thousands of operatives, and create financial disturbance, all resulting in the end in an increase of burden upon the consumer.

These gentlemen are in a position to know whereof they affirm; and they are undoubtedly correct. But what becomes of the argument that it matters not whether the currency be in Rhode Island or in Tennessee, if the aggregate reaches a certain prescribed average?

When the national banking system was inaugurated, these States had peculiar advantages, well understood at the time and eagerly seized. They caught the ball, so to speak, at the first hop. The bank circulation in those States has increased to a marvel, as the following table will abundantly show:

States.	1862.	1863.
Pennsylvania	$27, 689, 504	$42, 055, 781
New York	39, 182, 819	60, 976, 006
Connecticut	13, 842, 758	17, 934, 648
Rhode Island	6, 413, 404	13, 385, 840
Massachusetts	28, 957, 630	59, 523, 671
Total of five States	116, 086, 115	193, 935, 946

These figures have an eloquence peculiar to themselves, and I commend their careful and patient study to those of my southern associates who deemed it their duty to vote against me the other day. Believe me, they are full of instruction for us. You and I at least can talk understandingly together. And wrong-headed though you may think me, you will give me credit for honesty of purpose. For many years southern statesmanship had concentrated strongly upon a single important interest; until it resulted in a terrible, desolating war, which swept away this interest and the statesmanship also. The South has now many interests of importance, practically unknown to our predecessors, and requiring in us a statesmanship which looks beyond State rights and rights in the Territories. Amnesty and the payment of loyal claims have received much attention. But vastly more important than both of them together, is a flexible, self-adjusting currency, adequate to the varied business wants of our people.

Let us profit by the example of other communities and study the methods which have made them prosperous and wealthy. If an abundant currency is good for them, we may be sure it will not be bad for us. If they are eager to secure and retain every possible dollar of national-bank circulation, we may be sure it is because they find it profitable. If profitable for them, then not unprofitable for us. It is too late in the day to assume that we are a peculiar people, not amenable to the laws of trade which govern the rest of the world. We are touching matters beyond the domain of politics. We may lay aside for awhile the weapons of our partisan warfare. In the development of our material interests we have a common enterprise; no matter on which side we stood in the late conflict, or what may be our opinions of the constitutional amendments or the reconstruction acts, or even the civil-rights bill. And in this work no instrument is so all-important as money, money always to be had in exchange for value or upon valid security. For this purpose, money must have its home with us; it must belong there. It will not do to say that money will go where it is most wanted—that, like water, it will seek its level. Money is timid, stays close at home, or goes abroad only on the temptation of enormous interest. Take off the restrictions, then, and let our men of capital have the benefits of our great monetary systems, if they so incline. No harm can possibly follow.

I am pleased to know that I am not alone in these views. Thoughtful men, business men, familiar with our trade from boyhood, differing widely from me in many things, agree with me in this. From the mass of my correspondence I select a few passages. The names of the writers, the letters themselves not intended for publication, are at the disposition of gentlemen for private information.

One, writing from the capital of my own State, says:

> January 26.—You ask what is the sentiment of our people in regard to the currency question. Now, I believe with the community at large, (so far as the West and South make up the community,) that there should be an increase in the circulating medium, and that at once.
> January 27.—Since writing to you yesterday, I have had visits from several friends whom I have consulted in regard to their views, and that of the community generally, in respect to the necessity there exists for an increase in the volume of currency at present in circulation. They all agree with me that, with the exception of bankers and other money-lenders, there is a universal desire for a moderate inflation.

Speaking of the present bill, he adds:

> February 9.—At all events the bill seems to me as decidedly better than any other scheme that has come under my observation.
> I said in a previous letter that all bankers, brokers, and shavers would seek a contraction of the currency rather than an expansion of it. From what I read in the papers, and what I gather from Senator SHERMAN'S bill, lately reported to the Senate, I find I was not mistaken as to the efforts this class of men would make; nor was I mistaken as to the powerful influence such men as the great capitalists of New York, Boston, and other money centers can bring to bear on Congress.

Another, writing from the capital of Georgia, says:

> December 20.—I am sure your good business sense will cause you to keep clear of the fatal error of too much expansion, and the equal fallacy and fatal consequences of an attempt to force specie payments.

A few words as to the principles of this bill, and I have done.

The bill has been brought in upon the assumption—

First. That our present currency system of United States notes and national-bank notes is acceptable to the people, and will not be discontinued—to be amended, not radically changed.

Secondly. That the volume of United States notes will not be increased beyond the limit fixed ten years ago by the act of June 30, 1864.

Thirdly. That bank-notes, loanable only upon valid security and redeemable at the pleasure of the holder, cannot be issued in excess of the business necessities of the country.

Fourthly. That banks of circulation, deposit, and discount should be located in the same communities with their customers.

Fifthly. That the country is gradually readjusting her commerce to the specie standard, and the Government should, if possible, keep even pace with it.

Consequently, the bill makes no change in the system or plan of the currency, but provides that the volume of United States notes shall remain as fixed by the act of June 30, 1864; that the issue of national-bank notes shall be unlimited; that, with the exception of 5 per cent. of this circulation to be kept in the Treasury for redemption, each bank shall keep its reserves in its own vaults and redeem at its own counter; that the United States notes shall be supplanted by a gradual—very gradual—issue of similar notes, payable in coin. The other features of the bill are administrative.

Such is the measure we propose. There are gentlemen whose approval, if one may judge from their votes, it does not command. Let them bring forward something better, and I pledge myself in advance to its support. But, gentlemen, let me admonish you that obstruction and inaction will not do. The times demand some measure of financial relief. If we are adequate to it, well; if not, others will soon occupy our places believed to be more capable and stimulated to greater zeal by the unequivocal voice of the people. Beware the Ides of September!

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I deem it proper to state, while I consented that the bill presented by the chairman on the 27th day of January, and now under consideration, should be thus reported, yet I am not in favor of all of its provisions. The whole country seemed to be looking to us for some legislation upon these questions, and I desired that this House should be brought to a discussion regularly upon the propositions embraced in this bill, as well as the various financial measures now pending before us. To me this is the most difficult question I have ever tried to investigate; and when I have reached a conclusion which to my mind would seem to be satisfactory as to one portion of the country, yet when I came to apply the same principle to another portion it seemed not to work so well.

Indeed I do not regard it improper to say that, out of some twenty-five or twenty-six financial and business men who have been before the committee to give their views on these questions, no two of them agreed fully as to the causes of our financial troubles, nor did they agree as to the remedies to be applied. When these men, whose every-day business connects them with the great financial and commercial interests of the country, differ as to the defects in our present system of finances, and fail to agree upon the proper remedies, it is but natural to suppose that we upon this floor will differ more widely than they. But this, like all other great questions of governmental policy upon which there is a wide difference of opinion, must be settled by a fair and honorable compromise.

From the earliest history of our Government to the present time this question has been the theme of much discussion among our ablest statesmen, and at times has entered into the platforms of the great political parties of the country, and has been the pivot upon which some of those contests have turned. It will be conceded by all that nothing is more important in the administration of the affairs of a nation than a sound, reliable, and cheap currency; one that will answer and subserve the wants and purposes of all the people, as well as the Government itself. Many years ago Congress undertook to provide a currency for the whole country, and finally established the United States Bank, which was regarded by many good men at that time as almost a perfect system; yet this in a few years passed out of existence, and the principles upon which it was established were condemned by a majority of the people of the United States. After this the State banks sprang up in all the States, and furnished the general currency of the country, until they were taxed out of existence by our present national-currency laws.

I do not gainsay the right of the Government to regulate the currency; but in doing so it should be so regulated that it would not be liable to great fluctuations, to sudden or violent contractions or expansions, but should be made as stable and secure as possible. An unstable, unreliable, fluctuating curreney is very injurious to all classes of the people, and especially to the laborer.

Mr. Webster, in one of his great speeches, in discussing the financial problem of that day, thus describes what a currency should be; its kind, its objects, and general functions. He says:

> First, as to the currency of the country. This is at all times a most important political object. A sound currency is an essential and indispensable security for the fruits of industry and honest enterprise. Every man of property or industry, every man who desires to preserve what he honestly possesses, or to obtain what he can honestly earn, has a direct interest in maintaining a safe circulating medium, such a medium as shall be a real and substantial representative of property—not liable to vibrate with opinions, not subject to be blown up or blown down by the breath of speculation, but made stable and secure by its immediate relation to that which the whole world regards as of a permanent value. A disordered currency is one of the greatest of political evils. It undermines the virtues necessary for the support of the social system, and encourages propensities destructive of its happiness. It wars against indnstry, frugality, and economy; and it fosters the evil spirits of extravagance and speculation. Of all the contrivances for cheating the laboring classes of mankind none has been more effectual than that which deludes them with paper money. This is the most effectual of inventions to fertilize the rich man's field by the sweat of the poor man's brow. Ordinary tyranny, oppression, excessive taxation, these bear lightly on the happiness of the mass of the community compared with a fraudulent currency and the robberies committed by a depreciated paper. Our own history has recorded for our instruction enough, and more than enough, of the demoralizing tendency, the injustice, and the intolerable oppression on the virtuous and well disposed of a degraded paper currency authorized by law or in any way countenanced by government.

As to what effect a good sound currency would have, no language given would better describe than the above paragraph. Of what that currency should be made I add another high authority. Mr. Macdonell, in his Political Economy, says:

> Gold, silver, and copper possess certain properties which mark them out to be the cosmopolitan currency; it is not caprice frozen into convention, or the stamp of the mint, that has gained for them their present place; and Turgot says well, "Gold and silver are constituted, by the nature of things, money, and universal money, independently of all convention and law." They contain much value in small bulk; they are similar in quality wherever they are produced; they are indestructible; they are readily divisible, and yet do not suffer in beauty by division; and they are readily united. They are so scattered over the globe that the same expenditure of labor has, in the past at all events, generally produced about the same amount of metal, and being at once the most generally diffused and the rarest of metals, they are marked out by nature for coinage.

Some gentlemen say that gold and silver are not the standard of values; that the American coin will not pass in Europe or on the Continent. Now, while our coin will not pass there as it does here, at the same fixed value, yet their gold is the standard of value, and the products of those countries are regulated and fixed by it as the standard of their values.

In 12 Wallace, page 583, the Chief Justice in delivering the dissenting opinion on the legal-tender question, discussing the kind of money we should have, or rather of what it should consist, said:

> In considering this question we assume as a fundamental proposition that it is the duty of every government to establish a standard of value. The necessity of standard is indeed universally acknowledged. Without it the transactions of society would become impossible. All measures, whether of extent, or weight, or value, must have certain proportions of that which they are intended to measure. The unit of extent must have certain definite length, the unit of weight certain definite gravity, and the unit of value certain definite value. These units, multiplied or subdivided, supply the standards by which all measures are properly made. The selection, therefore, by the common consent of all nations, of gold and silver as the standard of value was natural, or, more correctly speaking, inevitable. For whatever definitions of value political economists may have given, they all agree that gold and silver have more value in proportion to weight and size, and are less subject to loss by wear or abrasion, than any other material capable of easy subdivision and impression, and that their value changes less and by slower degrees, through considerable periods of time, than that of any other substance which could be used for the same purpose. And these are qualities indispensable to the convenient use of the standard required. In the construction of the constitutional grant of power to establish a standard of value every presumption is, therefore, against that which would authorize the adoption of any other materials than those sanctioned by universal consent.

A nation should not establish a currency which is insecure, and which has no solid or substantial basis. The currency should be of uniform value all over this country, and taken in our intercourse with the world; one that will buy the cotton, sugar, and rice of the South, the farm products of the West, the iron and coal of the Middle States, the manufactures of the East, and be of equal value everywhere without discount. It should be stable and firm, one which cannot be "blown up or blown down," one which cannot be raised or depressed by outside and undue influences, one in which rich gamblers cannot make corners, one in which the hard-working laboring man has confidence, and feels and knows that it is the representative of true, and not fictitious values. It should be of universal exchangeability, so that with it he could pay any debt or dues, to the government or individuals, and purchase anything he should need or desire at any point in the world. It should be cheap so that what the holder has to pay for its use shall not exceed the value of the service it has to perform, for if the currency from any cause be so constituted that he who holds it should have to pay higher for its use than the value of the service it performs, then he becomes poorer every day, and it fails to perform its proper functions in this regard.

There are other qualities entering into a currency, such as elasticity, convertibility, &c., but the above constitute the groundwork of the general usefulness of a currency. I hold, sir, that no currency is safe, or will supply the wants of the country, keep down wild and reckless speculation, which is not based on coin; which is not on or nearly on a par with coin.

I do not mean that I would have all the transactions of the country carried on in specie. This would be impossible, as there is not coin enough in the country to answer our demands. I would have the paper which might be issued founded upon specie, every dollar of which, in the pocket of any man, would buy as many of the necessaries of life as the gold dollar. I would have that currency of such a value that the stock-gamblers could make no corners by buying up the coin and thus keeping the whole system of circulation in constant agitation. Should there be no difference in the value of coin and paper as a circulating medium, there would be no inducement to speculate in gold, because without discount its place could and would be supplied by a currency of equal value.

My opinion, then, is that we should so shape our legislation, so regulate the currency, that at some future day resumption shall take place. I would not have it done suddenly, so as to create any considerable shrinkage of value, but to come to the same so gradually that no one would feel the supposed or imaginary evil influences resulting therefrom. I believe if we were to declare that on the 1st day of January, 1876, we would resume specie payment, and would prepare a feasible plan for said resumption, and were to commence at that time to contract the paper currency of the country at the rate of $5,000,000 per month for one year, that the currency of the country would not be one dollar less at the end of the year, but would rather increase, because coin, which is now simply an article of merchandise, is hoarded up in vaults all over the country, (except in Texas and the Pacific States,) forming as it does the basis of Wall street speculation, would then become a part of our circulation everywhere; and while you would contract your paper $60,000,000, you would, in my opinion, put in circulation more than $100,000,000 in coin. Not only this, but when our circulation became equal to coin, it would be in harmony with the currency of the world; thus coin would flow in from other countries. Our paper money will not pass in England, or on the Continent, or outside of our own limits; consequently it is of no value outside of this country. After the panic last year a gentleman, writing over the name of Knickerbocker, said this in relation to a mixed currency:

> Severe as the lesson has been to all—sudden as the awakening from a blind trust in the perpetual postponement of the day of settlement under the much-vaunted merits of paper money—it is a question whether even yet that warning has aroused the public mind to a true sense of the danger, or brought fairly home to the national conscience the changeless, incontrovertible truth, that so long as we make one of the family of commercial nations we must use that money which is the common money of the world, or find no relief from the common fund of that money in the time of need.
> Had our circulating medium been of this character, or approached to this standard—that is to say, did it now consist of equal parts of coin and paper—the contraction caused by the recent sudden lapse of confidence, the withdrawal of currency, and the impaired power to perform its usual functions of that which remained, would have inevitably and immediately attracted an addition to its store of coin from foreign nations. This not being possible, the business of the country was compelled to contract itself to the amount of currency still left free. There was no hope of aid from foreign sources. Gold and silver, the only money with which foreign nations could have aided us in our need, are no longer money with us—they would only have served as an additional sum of commodities to be dealt in, bought and sold with the very currency which proved insufficient for already existing transactions, or rather such part of it as a timorous public still left free for such purposes.

Coin, like any other article of merchandise or commodity, will go where it is most needed, and where it can be most profitably employed. When coin shall be thrown into circulation and shall be in demand in its highest and best sense, namely, for circulation as currency, then in obedience to the law of demand it will flow into the country, instead of flowing out as it now does. Sir, there is far less coin in the country to-day than there was in 1861. Within that period the domestic product of the mines has been about $30,000,000 per year, and the imports have been about $20,000,000; but the exports have exceeded both of these sums. I give a summary for the period of thirteen years from 1861 to 1873, inclusive:

Gold product in the United States	$369, 337, 853
Silver product in the United States	21, 120, 136

Deducting the former from the latter makes a loss of $188,470,154 in that period.

How is this to be accounted for, except upon the idea that coin has in a very great degree ceased to form a part of the circulating medium, has since 1861 ceased to perform the functions it was intended to perform; and being in demand there, it has gone to Europe and other countries, because it enters into and forms a part of their circulation? Some may say that the war was the cause of all this great excess of exports of the precious metals, but an examination will show that the exports were less during the war than since.

From July 30, 1860, to July 30, 1865, a period of five years, the loss was $28,000,000; while from July 30, 1865, to July 30, 1873, a period of eight years, the loss was $160,000,000. If we would retain our coin at home, throw it into circulation for five years, at the end of that time we would have enough circulation of that kind to answer all the demands of the country, if such a circulation alone were desirable. If it be true, as I have said, that a currency based on specie is less liable to fluctuation, is more stable and secure than an irredeemable paper currency, then it is the one the laboring man especially needs. If he gets a fair remuneration for his labor, and should be paid in paper money, he knows it is based on coin, and that its purchasing power is the same as gold. Suppose he could even get far more per day for his labor, if he is paid in depreciated paper money, its purchasing power would be far less than when he worked for coin.

Sir, one of my friends who was in the confederate army has given me a good illustration of this principle. He says in the last days of that contest he gave sixty-five dollars in confederate money for one dozen eggs, and he knew an officer to give as high as $500 for one good square meal. The money-sharper can take advantage of a fluctuating currency, making his thousands by both the rise and the fall, while the unsuspecting man of toil finds, when it is too late, that he has taken for his hard labor that which will not purchase 75 per cent. of its nominal value.

The following extract, which I took from a paper a few days since, fitly describes the effect of an unstable currency upon the laboring classes:

> Labor is first to feel a decline in money value (purchasing capacity) and last to experience its rise. Labor works at the same price per day long after a dollar will buy but seventy-five cents' worth. Labor first begins to decline when a dollar approaches its true worth, though provisions still keep up, because the demand must be about the same. Anything tending to lower the value of money then, must be oppressive on labor, which is the basis of business and society. No one denies that inflation decreases the purchasing capacity of money. The conclusion is evident.

We have three kinds of currency now in the country. First, coin, which pays all debts, dues, and demands, public and private, and passes throughout the world. Secondly, legal-tenders, which are taken in payment of all debts and dues, private and public, except for duties and imposts and the interest on the public debt. Thirdly, national-bank notes, which are taken for all public dues and demands except for duties and imposts and the interest on the public debt, and are redeemable in legal-tenders.

Now, the Government, by making this distinction as it now exists, depreciates her own money. We say it will do to pay all private debts, but not good enough to pay the duties or imposts; good enough to pay most of the public dues, but not good enough to pay the interest on the public debt; good enough for the people generally, but not good enough for the Government herself or the bondholder.

Sir, it is the duty of this law-making power to bring these currencies in harmony with each other. The one must be taken where the other is taken, and this will be the inevitable result when specie payment is resumed. I insist that under the specie standard the commercial system is better regulated, the internal trade and business of the whole people is in a healthier condition, and the wages of the laboring man secures for him more of the comforts and necessaries of life than they will under a different system. The general increase in the price of labor since 1860, is said by those who know, to be about 50 per cent., while the general increase in the prices of the necessaries and comforts of life is about 75 per cent.

We are told that the country was never more prosperous and happy than it is now under this system. This in part I deny. The Eastern, Middle, and Northwestern States may be more prosperous, because since 1860 they have had thirteen years in which to grow, expand, and increase, but the South to-day is not half so rich as then. Two billions of active productive capital has been taken from them and turned into a great political machine. They cannot command the labor, and the result is their lands have greatly depreciated, and they have not the resources to build up rapidly. But suppose the late war had never occurred, and we had continued under the specie system we had at the commencement of the war, we as a nation would have been far more prosperous than now, while our products would have been worth billions more that at this time.

I do not intend to be understood as desiring the immediate resumption of specie payments, but at some future time, and at such timely notice that the whole country can prepare to meet it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, have we currency enough in circulation, and which can be put in circulation by cutting loose the reserves in circulation, to answer the legitimate demands of the country? I answer, when properly distributed and regulated, there is. Now, although I believe there is ample currency to supply our wants, yet to meet what seems to me a pressing demand now from the South and West for more money I voted for the bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue and put in circulation the remainder of the reserve of $44,000,000 not heretofore issued, making the limit of the legal-tenders now in circulation and to be issued $400,000,000.

There is another reason why I am in favor of issuing the remainder of that sum, because I do not think the Secretary had any authority to issue what has already been put in circulation; and as to recall the amount now already issued would produce some financial trouble, I think it better to ratify his action and have the whole issued. There should be money enough of some kind in circulation to carry on the commerce of the country; to regulate trade and business between man and man; to pay the laborer a fair price for his hire; to move the products of the country to market; to insure for them a fair and reasonable price; to keep in operation the great mining and mechanical interests of the country; and any beyond that is injurious alike to all classes of society. It begets speculation, high, wasteful, and extravagant living, ending in panics, commercial revulsions, and general bankruptcy.

In 1860, all will admit we were prosperous and rapidly increasing in wealth, and the resources of the country were being rapidly developed. Then we had a population of about thirty-one millions; the whole wealth of the nation was estimated at $16,000,000,000; the business of the country was then carried on by a circulation of about $425,000,000. Of this there were in bank paper about $207,000,000. The remainder was in gold. Much of this was in banks and did not enter into the circulation. If you take the paper circulation at that time, it only constituted about 1½ per cent. of the values of the United States. If you take the whole paper and coin together it was about 2.60 per cent. of said values. Let us compare that state of things with the present. We have now a population say of forty-two million. The wealth of the nation is about $30,000,000,000. The circulation of the country now is:

Legal-tenders	$354, 000, 000
National-bank notes	356, 000, 000
Fractional currency	50, 000, 000
Coin	140, 000, 000
Total	900, 000, 000

This makes 2.80 per cent. of the values of the nation in paper currency, and 3 per cent. on said values in gold and paper; and should the balance of the $44,000,000 be issued, then it would be about 3½ per cent. on the values of the nation. The above figures show an immense increase in the circulation since 1860 — an increase of more than $500,000,000—in paper money.

The financial system of Great Britain is said to be one of the best in the world, and yet an intelligent writer says that the paper circulation of that country has only increased about $5,000,000 since 1824, while in that time her population has doubled, and her commerce and business have increased threefold. The circulation of any country bears but a small proportion to its wealth or business; most is done on a credit, and bills of exchange and notes settle the balances. It is estimated that $3,000,000 will do $100,000,000 worth of business; credit settles the balance. If this be true, then we have in circulation enough to carry on at any one time $26,000,000,000 of business.

Some have attributed the panic of last year to a scarcity of money. This I do not believe. It resulted from a variety of causes, and among them were the following: A large amount of money had been accumulating from time to time in New York; speculators and adventurers had borrowed largely and had commenced to build railroads before they were needed. Jay Cooke & Co., who had gone largely into these things, and who were supposed to be immensely wealthy, failing suddenly, the whole country became alarmed. Banks and individuals held on to their money; the South and West failed to get money from the East to move their crops; business was suspended, and a general crash ensued because of a want of confidence. But as soon as confidence was restored the money began to flow out and business revived. But panics will occasionally occur, and all the legislation we can do will not prevent them. They result from other causes rather than from a scarcity of money. It is a remarkable fact that there was more money in circulation and specie in the banks in 1857, the year of the panic, than there was the year preceding or the year after. The circulation of these three years and the specie in the banks were:

Class of currency.	1856.	1857.	1858.
Specie in banks	$59,314,063	$58,349,838	$74,412,832
Paper circulation	195,747,950	214,778,822	155,208,344
Total	254,062,013	272,127,660	229,621,176

There were nearly $20,000,000 more in circulation in 1857 than the preceding year, and nearly $50,000,000 more than there was in 1858; at which time everything went on smoothly and prosperously. It will also be observed that there was an increase in coin of about $16,000,000 in 1858. This increase gave confidence to the country.

It will be seen that this panic was not caused by a scarcity of money. I know of but one way to avoid panics, or if they cannot be avoided, to lessen their direful effect; that is, to have a specie currency, or a currency based upon specie, so that it cannot be "blown up or blown down" by speculators and stock-gamblers. They have in California a specie circulation, but they had no panic there last year. Senator SARGENT lately said in the Senate—

> Mr. President, I had not supposed that, under any circumstances, I should be induced to make any remarks upon these financial propositions, and I do not now propose to offer more than a very few suggestions. Fortunately for my own State, during the past ten years, or since these financial problems became of interest, it has had a stable currency; it has had a currency peculiarly its own; and during all that time we have not had, by reason of the abundance or superabundance of money, inflation of values; nor when the business of the country or other causes effected a proportionate decrease in the volume of the currency have we had prices falling, breaking down our business, and reducing the value of our property. We have had during all that time no panics of any description, and scarcely a notable failure.

There should be a necessary proportion between the circulation of the country and the business, so that there should be no excess of the former; for as too much food deranges the human system, so too much circulation disorganizes the whole body-politic. In 1860 the paper circulation per head was $3.65; in gold and paper combined it was about $13.85. Now the circulation per head for paper is $18.20; in gold and paper combined is $21.50. Should the balance of the $44,000,000 be issued and the reserves cut down, then there will be about $22.75 per capita for our whole population, far exceeding that of any previous period in our history.

Mr. Speaker, that there are defects in our present system of banking, and the distribution of the circulation and the banking capital, is very evident. That the South and West are suffering for more currency is certainly true; they are entitled to it and should have it. What are the remedies for these defects; how is the more equal distribution of the capital and currency to be accomplished? These are grave and serious questions. It is easy to see that the patient is sick, that he is suffering terribly; but what remedies shall be applied to effect his cure? inquires the skillful, intelligent physician.

I have before remarked, in my judgment when the balance of the $44,000,000 is issued there will be the amplest amount of currency to supply the wants of every part of the country and to subserve all the legitimate demands of the whole people. I shall also advocate the cutting loose the reserves in circulation now held by the banks, except a small per cent., as in this bill, which may be held for redeeming purposes. I am also in favor of requiring the banks to hold in their own vaults their reserves on their deposits. Prudent and honest bankers will always keep on hand a sufficient reserve to meet their liabilities, and yet these provisions would put it within their power to accommodate the people in cases of emergency. When the reserves on deposits are to be held in each bank, then there is no hoarding up in the cities as under the present law, thereby inducing reckless speculation.

You may say the banks should keep the present reserves to insure the payments of the deposits. I answer, the Government cannot undertake to become the surety for all the bank directors and officials, but it secures the note-holder because it retains 10 per cent. on the bonds to secure him against loss; but every depositor must look to the honesty, integrity, and responsibility of the bank officers before he makes his deposits. The honest banker will observe the law, while the dishonest disregards it. You may say that the banks sometimes keep their reserves in the cities and make interest on the same, and to require them to keep the reserves on deposit at home is hard on them. I answer, the banks have large and extraordinary powers and privileges conferred upon them, and, as a general thing, make handsome profits on their capital, and if these restrictions will be the means of accommodating the people the banks should not complain.

I am in favor of the bill introduced into the Senate by Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, to have executed the sixth section of the act of July 12, 1870, which is to withdraw $25,000,000 from the Eastern and Middle States of the banking capital they have drawn over and above their proportion, and to give the Southern and Western States the same, or so much thereof as they can take.

Applications are being made almost every day by persons from the South and West for more banking facilities. I do not desire or intend to make war on these sections, to deprive them of any of their rights, but I desire this as an act of justice to the South and West, and the same should be immediately executed. I know it is said money and currency is like water—it will find its level; that it will go where it can find profitable investment, where there are great products to be had, where business is flourishing. Yet it is also true if you will establish banks in the South and West with this $25,000,000, you localize the capital and put it within the power of the people living there to secure loans when they could not do so from the banks which are far from home. After this $25,000,000 shall have been taken from these sections they will still have far more than their portion of the bank capital, either according to wealth or population.

According to the statement of the Comptroller of the Currency, the amount of the bank circulation in the different sections per capita is as follows: Eastern States, $31.68; Middle States, $12.82; Southern and Southwestern States, $2.91; Western States, $7.09; Pacific States and Territories, $1.82—when the average should be $9.18 per capita.

The following table exhibits the apportionment of the whole amount of circulation authorized by law ($354,000,000) to the different States and Territories, upon the basis of population and wealth as given in the census returns of 1870, together with the amount outstanding and authorized, and the excess and deficiency:

By this table it will be seen that the Eastern States have $70,670,046 more than their fair proportion in population and wealth, the Middle States have $9,416,503 more, while the Southern and Southwestern States lack of having their proportion $51,271,034, and the Western States $21,423,811. The Eastern and Middle States having $80,000,000 more than their proportion, it is but reasonable and fair that they should pay back the $25,000,000.

You may ask why it was that the Southern and Western States did not take more of the bank capital than they did. The answer is a very plain one, so far as the South is concerned. The original banking act was passed in 1864, before the war closed, and the subsequent acts increasing the amount were passed soon after the close of the war. Those States, at the time these laws were passed, had been impoverished by the war; two billions of their active, productive capital had been taken from them and turned into a great political machine; they had no labor to cultivate their cotton, rice, and sugar fields, or any money to employ labor; their former slaves, and, what was far worse if possible, the carpet-baggers, took control of their various Legislatures, under military governors, and were robbing them of what little they had left. They had not money enough to pay the taxes heaped upon them by these carpet-baggers, much less to establish banks. Before they could recuperate from this terrible condition of things this large amount of capital had been taken up by the Eastern and Middle States, which had made immense profits out of the war. Many of the laboring men of the West had been in the war; they had been changed from producers to consumers; and this section was also so much crippled during that time that it was not in a condition to establish many banks.

Mr. Speaker, the South and West are struggling under utter disadvantages and hardships. Besides the want of currency, they pay an undue proportion of the taxes imposed on the people. Of the $188,000,000 raised by customs last year, I suppose no one can tell who or what sections paid most; but of the $106,000,000 raised by the internal revenue, we do know how much and where it was paid.

Now, here are the Eastern States, with a population of 2,487,924, with a bank circulation of $110,489,966, and pay only $5,575,554; the Middle States, with a population of 9,721,519, with a circulation of $124,608,139, pay $32,676,417; while the Southern and Southwestern States, with a population of 12,916,078, with a circulation of $38,160,308, pay $22,480,318, and the Western States, with a population of 11,288,000, with a circulation of $78,785,148, pay $42,758,907. On this sum, raised by internal revenue, the Eastern States pay about 5 per cent. on their bank circulation, the Middle States about 8 per cent. on theirs, while the Southern and Southwestern States pay about 60 per cent. on theirs, and the Western States about 55 per cent. on theirs. The State of Kentucky, with a circulation of seven and a half millions, pays nearly as much of this tax as all the Eastern States, with a circulation of one hundred and ten and a half millions. Virginia, with only a circulation of four millions, pays about seven and a half millions of this tax, or more than all the Eastern States. Illinois pays about sixteen millions, or three times as much as the Eastern States. Ohio pays about fifteen millions, or nearly three times as much as the Eastern States. The amount paid by Virginia last year of this tax was nearly twice the amount of her entire bank circulation. The amounts paid by Illinois, Missouri, and North Carolina last year were nearly as great as their bank circulation.

Sir, it seems to me that the demand of the West and South for more circulation is not unfounded, but should be complied with. They should have the benefit of the $25,000,000 to be drawn from the Eastern and Middle States, and the balance of the $44,000,000 reserve not yet issued, as far as the Secretary of the Treasury can control it in that regard.

We owe an immense debt, namely, $2,237,334,214. Of this sum we are paying interest in coin on $1,752,275,644; on two-thirds of this latter sum we pay 6 per cent. interest, making about $100,000,000 of interest we pay annually in coin, and most of this is paid to foreign capitalists; and though our mines yield largely every year, yet the whole of it and more goes to pay this large amount of interest due to foreigners. Besides this the balance of trade is against us, and these balances must be settled in gold. These things cannot long exist and leave us prosperous; and he who will devise a practical plan or system by which the whole bonded debt of the nation can be taken upand a new debt created, bearing a low rate of interest, payable in currency, will confer a lasting benefit on us and our posterity.

I have no hostility to the national banks; I own no stock in any of them; I do not desire to do them any injustice; but for the good of the whole country, I hope to see the day when they will not have United States bonds as the basis of their capital, but will have coin. Ceasing to be banks of issue, they will have a common currency; and when this shall occur under wise legislation, we may expect prosperity to abound throughout the entire land.

Mr. Speaker, these measures of which I have spoken, and which I shall approve, namely, the cutting loose the reserves in circulation, except a small percentage for resumption purposes as is provided for in the bill—the issuing the balance of the $44,000,000—will make an increase in the available circulation of the country of at least $75,000,000. The benefit which the South and West will receive from these sources, together with the full benefit of the $25,000,000 which should be drawn from the Eastern and Middle States, I hope and believe will relieve them, and will enable those sections to develop their untold resources. If these remedies when tried prove insufficient, or ineffectual, I will adopt any scheme or plan to accomplish that result which in my judgment will not prove detrimental to the interests of our common country.

One other suggestion, and I shall have concluded. It was very properly remarked a few days since by my colleague, [Mr. BECK,] that there is something behind all this currency question which must be regulated before we of the South and West can hope to have permanent prosperity.

So long as we are compelled by reason of the present high tariff to pay tribute to the large manufacturing monopolies and rings of the Eastern States, and to the ironmongers of the Middle States, we shall remain poor, while they grow rich every day. Under the operations of this tariff and the internal-revenue system, the products of the South and West (I mean spirits and tobacco) are taxed heavily, and you pay the Eastern and Middle States a premium on their products.

Can any man tell me why I, as a western man, am taxed at the rate of 130 per cent. on the salt I use, and the eastern man is exempted from that tax? Why should we be taxed from 43 to 104 per cent. on iron, from 31 to 53 per cent. on steel, and 35 per cent. on leather, and from 20 to 60 per cent. on cotton and woolen goods, for the benefit of those monopolies, when so little of it goes into the Treasury?

I was struck, a few days since, in looking over a table in a speech made by my colleague [Mr. CROSSLAND] in this House during the last Congress. It shows how costly the tariff is. He takes five items; the first column shows the amount of the revenue, the second what we pay to produce that revenue:

Salt	$1,176,587	$3,260,000
Iron and steel	20,530,000	87,404,000
Leather	5,200,000	36,000,000
Cotton goods	10,773,832	69,700,000
Woolen goods	33,539,475	119,680,000
Total	71,219,894	316,044,000

We thus pay the enormous sum of $316,044,000 to put into the Treasury $71,219,894.

There are other articles upon which the tariff is as high as on these. Under such a system you cannot equalize the currency. You may equalize it to-day, and in less than one year it will have been gathered up by the collectors of direct and indirect taxes, and will find its way into the pockets of these eastern millionaires.

Regulate the tariff, not with a view of protection but to put it on a basis that will produce more revenue; then our exports will go abroad, and the balance of trade will soon be in our favor. Reduce the expenses of every Department of the Government as far as it can be done with due regard to the public good; reduce the Army at least one-third, turn that third into producers rather than consumers, withdraw all the troops from the interior States and put them on the frontier, and in this way save $5,000,000 per year; regulate the tariff as indicated, then we may hope that our circulation, if based on coin, would flow from one section of the country to the other in obedience to the law of supply and demand, and the whole country would take a new start on the road to permanent prosperity.

Mr. FARWELL. Mr. Speaker, the question of the currency is the most important question now agitating the public mind. It has been discussed by the press of the country throughout the land, and yet there seems to be no uniform opinion upon the subject. I do not propose to take up but a small portion of the time of the House in what I shall have to say upon this subject.

When Congress passed the national-currency act, two things were attempted to be done: first, to abolish all the banks of issue in the several States; secondly, to supply the country with the currency in place of that retired by the act. The former was successfully accomplished; the latter only in part—in part because the amount was limited under the act. Congress assumed the right to fix the limit to the currency of the country, and said to the people, "Thus far you shall go and no farther." The act created a monopoly of bankers, which is against the spirit of our institutions, and afforded privileges to the few and denied the same privileges to the many. If the act had provided that all should have the same privileges that are accorded to the few, the second proposition would have been accomplished, namely, the people would have had the privilege of supplying themselves with all the currency which business and commerce required.

The bill now under discussion aims to remedy some of the defects of the currency act. It proposes to remove the restriction upon the volume and amount of national-bank notes. I do not favor this proposition because it will increase the circulation of national-bank notes, but because it gives the people the option to decrease or increase the volume as their wants may from time to time require. I do not propose to consider the question of inflation or contraction in connection with this bill, but to favor such legislation as will enable the people to supply their wants. If the issuing of currency under the national-currency act is made free, the people will avail themselves of just the amount they want and no more. The great law of supply and demand will regulate the volume; legislation will not and cannot.

It is averred by many that the proposition to make banking free will have a tendency to inflate prices. This cannot be done under this bill, because under the third section an easy method of redemption is provided for, and any redundancy of national-bank notes will be checked by this section. Inflation begins and ends with the legal-tender notes. The legal-tender notes are the basis of our banking operations. They perform the same functions that gold does under a specie basis; and, as there is no law providing for their redemption or retirement at the option of the holders, as is provided for national-bank notes, an increase of their volume would tend to inflate prices. The amount now fixed by this House should not be increased for this reason. It is not necessary that the volume should be increased; in my judgment it would be wise to reduce the volume of legal-tender notes, provided the national banking system is to be continued and made free. At all events, the country should be made to understand that the volume of legal-tender notes is not to be increased at the will of the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not object to the sum of $400,000,000 fixed as the maximum; I would prefer that it be fixed at $358,000,000 with free banking, and I am not quite sure but that it would be wiser to fix the volume at $300,000,000. That amount, in my judgment, would be sufficient as a redeeming agent for any volume of national-bank notes that might be taken out under the national-currency act when we have removed the restriction.

The time will come when the legal-tender notes will be retired. They should never be retired by an act compelling the Secretary of the Treasury to pay them; but an act should be passed by Congress that would give the option to the national banks to fund them at a small specified rate of interest. When the time comes, when our exports shall exceed our imports, and gold shall thereby flow into the country, then the national banks would avail themselves of the option under an act of this kind. Until that time arrives, the legal-tender notes must continue to perform the functions that they now do, or else, if funded, the national banks must be permitted to suspend specie payment.

Specie payment cannot be maintained in this country with the balance of trade against us. This is not only my own opinion upon this subject, but was the opinion of all the distinguished gentlemen, except one, who have recently given testimony before the Committee on Banking and Currency upon this subject.

It seems to me that if this question was rightly understood, no one could object to what is called free banking. If there is too much currency in the country, under this bill all national-bank notes can be retired, and very speedily.

If this provision of the bill, which makes banking free, shall be adopted by Congress, it will do much to perfect our currency system. In fact, little else is necessary to be done.

I would suggest other amendments, but I do not expect them to be adopted at this time.

I would relieve the banks from the operations of the State usury laws and authorize them to lend money for what it is worth. Competition regulates the price of money as it does everything else. These laws are rarely obeyed, and while it is not within our jurisdiction to repeal them, we can exempt the banks from their operation.

I would go still further. I would repeal all those provisions of the national-currency act which interfere with the banks in any manner whatever. It is an assumption on the part of the Government to interfere in or in any way regulate the business of banking, unless it is what may relate to the currency which it issues to them. Permitting them to issue notes is only a very small portion of the business of banking, and if the Government desires to exercise a paternal care over these issues, I have no objection.

We have legislated the State banks out of existence. Having done so, it is our duty to permit the people to supply themselves with something in their stead. This we do by requiring them to secure their notes; but I would like to ask any man where we get the right to interfere in all the business of the banks? Does the issuing of these notes to these banks at ninety cents on the dollar upon our bonds confer any right to manage their other business? The aggregate circulation which we permit them to have, added to the whole volume of legal-tender notes, performs less than one-tenth of the business of the country. Why, then, I say again, should we interfere in the other nine-tenths of the business which these banks perform? The great bulk of business is done upon bank credits, and it is well known to you, Mr. Speaker, that in the transactions of the banks in New York City, amounting upon the average to $100,000,000 daily, only 3 per cent. of currency is employed. Now, when it supplies so small a part of the machinery of business, why should we interfere in the business of banking? If the United States were a stockholder in these institutions, even to a small extent, I could then see the reason why we should supervise their business; but as their capital is all their own, and the Government of the United States has no interest whatever in these institutions, why should they not be left perfectly free to manage their own affairs in their own way, precisely the same as all other business is managed?

It is well known that when a national bank fails, it is always found that it has violated the national-currency act. The security which our supervision is supposed to give depositors—and it is for them alone that this supervision is provided—is found to be absolutely valueless; the reserves are gone.

This supervision ought to be abolished for another reason. We often give credit and respectability to banks which their owners do not possess, leading people to do business with them which they would not do if this supervision was abolished. We should not give real or imaginary credit to banks or individuals which has the least tendency to mislead; but banking and bankers should have credit based only upon capital, credit, honesty, integrity, and capacity. I need only refer to the notable instance of the First National Bank of this city, located in the very shadow of the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, to prove the absolute worthlessness of this governmental care and supervision over our banking institutions. We should not supervise banking, unless it is proposed to supervise all kinds of business.

When Congress has passed such currency laws as will secure the bill-holder, its duty is done. When the restrictions are removed, as provided for by the bill now under discussion, we shall have given to all the people the privilege now only accorded to the few. We can all of us obtain as much currency as is needed, provided always that we have something with which to buy it.

As I have before remarked, it is believed by some persons that to make banking free will be to flood the country with a vast amount of currency. This, in my judgment, is a fallacy. There can be no inflation of national-bank notes under this bill. I know of but two ways to get money: one is to exchange something for it; the other, to borrow it.

The West and South, it is claimed, want more money. That want, I fancy, is not confined to those localities alone. We all want more money. We at the West and South will have banks and money when we are rich enough to exchange something for them, and not before. Banks will be organized where there is capital, and where it can be profitably employed; and the demands of the West and the South for more money and New England for less money will be complied with by making banking free.

Now, much has been said about the character of our currency; it has been called irredeemable, dishonest, broken promises, and so forth. All the ills that afflict the body-politic have been charged to it. It was said before the Committee on Banking and Currency, by a distinguished writer upon political economy, that the price of labor in New England had advanced, since 1860, 54 per cent.; that the cost of living to their operatives had been increased from 60 to 75 per cent., all on account of this much-abused currency; that prices were inflated thereby greatly in excess of the difference between gold and currency; and that the only road to prosperity was by contraction. Further, that while it would reduce the wages of their operatives, the prices of their living would be decreased in a greater ratio; that the increased cost of their manufactures had lost them their China trade, which could only be regained by the contraction of the currency, so that the articles exported to that country could be produced at a less cost. He also stated that the farmers of this country lost in the year 1873 $75,000,000 on account of this bad currency; that they were obliged to sell in Europe for gold; that the cost of production was paid for in currency, and that, he said, was the reason of their loss. And furthermore he informed the committee that pork, beef, and wheat, before the war, were as high, if not higher, in gold than they are at this time in currency. He was asked to explain how it was that the New England operatives were compelled to pay from 60 to 75 per cent. more for living now than before the war, when these articles of consumption were as low in currency as they were in gold before that time. He replied that he would answer at some future time, if the committee would give him an opportunity.

Now, I affirm that there is no difference in the price of cotton and woolen manufactures in this country beyond the gold premium. In making a comparison, in a list of sixteen articles of cotton manufacture, showing the prices on the 3d of March, 1860, in gold, with cotton at eleven cents a pound, and the prices of the same articles in currency with cotton at sixteen and one-fourth cents a pound, I find that the difference is about the difference between gold and currency. On two of these articles the prices were the same.

It seems to me that this comparison shows the fallacy of the position assumed by the distinguished political economist.

A return to specie payments is not necessary to the successful prosecution of business. The past decade wss one of the most prosperous in our history, and I for one am content to let well enough alone.

Specie resumption will not be brought about by legislating about the currency. When we want to pay specie we must have the specie with which to pay. We could obtain it by exchanging our exports for it; and when our exports are not exceeded by our imports we shall have the wherewithal to do it, and we may resume. We may resolve as much as we please, and legislate as much as we please, but this will not create coin. If our industries can be kept profitably and constantly employed our needs for foreign articles will be lessened, and in a few years we shall grow up to that favorable condition of trade which will bring gold into the country and make it easy to resume. We may contract the currency to meet the wishes of those who desire resumption to be brought about in that way, and the result will be that our revenues will fall off and we shall be compelled to impose additional taxation to meet the expenses of the Government. Liquidation of this kind is wanted by those who desire to make the dollars they own worth more. Now, I suppose it is not our duty to legislate for this class to the exclusion of all others. They talk about dishonest promises, but who else complains? The active business men of the country do not desire to reduce their business, nor do the manufacturers desire to turn out their operatives to beg or starve. Forced contraction will produce both these results. When the labor of the country is employed all classes are prosperous and we have no bread riots.

It is not denied by the advocates of speedy and forced resumption but that the road is through privation and suffering. How often did we hear it said during the late panic, "We have suffered this much; let us suffer a little more, and we shall have specie resumption."

Specie resumption is no doubt desirable; but we cannot pay specie until we have it. We cannot pay gold unless we have gold. If we could transmute clay into gold, we could adopt Mr. Greeley's formula, "the way to resume is to resume."

In conclusion I desire to say, a settled policy must sooner or later be adopted, so that Congress can dismiss forever the subject of the currency. Until this is done our finances will be disturbed and our business will be paralyzed to a greater or less extent.

The country is waiting now in feverish anxiety to see what Congress will do upon this subject, and it is all-important that what we do shall be done quickly. When we shall have passed a free-banking law, we shall have taken the first great step, in my opinion, toward this settled policy.

When that favorable condition of trade shall come so that we shall accumulate gold, gold will take the place of legal-tender notes. Then we can give the option to holders of greenbacks to fund them, by an act for that purpose, and our legislation will have been completed.

Mr. Speaker, the bill reported by the committee provides as follows:

Section 1 relieves the banks from keeping a reserve upon their circulation, and ought to pass. The bill-holder is secured from all possibility of loss, and there is no good reason why this requirement should be continued, as there never was any reason for its enactment in the first place.

Section 2 removes the restriction upon the amount of national-bank notes, and permits banks to increase their capital and circulation to any amount; in fact, it makes banking free. It is the main feature in the bill, and I need not say that in my opinion this section, if all the others fail, should pass.

Section 3 provides an easy and rapid mode for retiring any redundancy of national-bank notes, and is a complete check to any inflation beyond the wants of commerce.

Section 4 permits banks to retire their circulation, and to withdraw the bonds pledged for their security.

Section 5 requires the banks to keep their reserves in their own vaults.

Section 6 requires the Secretary of the Treasury to print the charter number upon the bills of the respective banks. This is simply a regulation to facilitate the assorting of the notes when sent to the Treasury for redemption.

Section 7 authorizes the organization of banks without circulation, and in my judgment ought not to pass. It is not the business of Congress to confer either real or imaginary credit upon banks or individuals, as this section will do if passed.

Section 8 provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue a new kind of notes, commencing on the 1st day of July next, at the rate of $2,000,000 per month, payable in gold two years after date, and to retire and destroy an equal amount of the legal-tender notes.

While I am not in favor of this proposition, I am prepared to vote for it, and also for section 7, rather than have the bill fail. I believe that our legislation upon this subject will only be perfected by amendments made from time to time, and with this view I consent to these two sections, but I would much prefer that they be stricken from the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL obtained the floor.

Mr. MAYNARD. With the permission of the gentleman from Wisconsin, I will enter, pro forma, a motion to recommit the bill, at the same time saying that I do not propose thereby to cut off amendments. I will wait until the discussion has been closed, and then let amendments be offered. I will not ask for a session for discussion this evening, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MITCHELL] prefers to speak to-morrow.

Mr. ELDREDGE. My colleague yields to me to move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. COX. Is it in order for me to offer an amendment, so as to have it read and printed?

The SPEAKER. The amendment cannot be considered as pending, because the gentleman from Tennessee has made a motion to recommit the bill; but it may be read as an amendment which the gentleman will offer when in order.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

That each one-dollar greenback note now in circulation shall be a legal tender for three dollars, and each two, five, and ten dollar greenback note shall be, and is hereby, declared a legal tender for three times its present value.

[Laughter.]

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 485) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the schooner Carrie, of Eastport, Maine;

A bill (H. R. No. 1954) granting a pension to Henry B. Ryder; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2651) reappropriating certain unexpended balances of appropriation for removal of Indians.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LAMPORT was granted leave of absence for ten days.

Mr. STRAWBRIDGE was granted leave of absence for one week.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, was granted leave of absence for ten days from to-day.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

Mr. WHEELER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with amendments the bill (S. No. 350) providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal; and moved that it be recommitted, and the bill and amendments printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MANUFACTURE OF GOVERNMENT ISSUES.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New York, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of merchants, bankers, and others, that the manufacture of Government issues hereafter be made to conform to the plan recommended by the Joint Select Committee on Retrenchment, under date of March 3, 1869; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD.

The petition was as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

Your petitioners respectfully represent that, in their opinion, it is of great importance that all of the issues of the Government should be so treated during the various processes of their manufacture as to secure them against possible danger of fraud, such as counterfeiting, altering, duplicating, or overissuing; that whereas the Joint Select Committee on Retrenchment, under date of March 3, 1869, reported and recommended as follows, namely: "The highest safety is to be attained by so conducting the work that no one, or even two, departments should have it in their power to finish any note, bond, or coupon, but that one part of the engraving on the securities should be printed by one establishment, and a succeeding part by another department entirely distinct and separate from the first, and that the final process of sealing and signing should be done by still another distinct and separate department, and in the Treasury; by such methods, each under separate and distinct control, the nearest approach possible to security will be reached;" and whereas this plan was approved and adopted in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances for the year 1869; and whereas this plan has been dangerously departed from:

Now therefore, to prevent the possibility of fraud in the preparation of Government issues, and that the confidence of the public, both here and abroad, in their integrity may be strengthened and never impaired, your petitioners respectfully request that a law may be passed authorizing and requiring the Secretary of the Treasury, in the manufacture of all Government issues hereafter to be made, to conform to the plan recommended by the Joint Select Committee on Retrenchment aforesaid.

IMPROVEMENT OF BIG SODUS HARBOR, NEW YORK.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of 539 citizens of Wayne County, New York, asking an appropriation of $30,000 for the improvement of Big Sodus Harbor, Lake Ontario; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the signatures.

The memorial was as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, citizens of Wayne County, State of New York, in public meeting assembled, do respectfully represent to your honorable body the interests of the harbor of Big Sodus, and its claims upon your attention in the following memorial:

Big Sodus, situated on the south shore of Lake Ontario, in the county of Wayne, and State of New York, is one of the largest and most commodious harbors on this lake, and when in good condition is a harbor of refuge for all the shipping traversing this great commercial highway, and has been used as such from an early period.

To make this almost perfect natural harbor still nearer perfect, the Government, in 1830, constructed a light-house and piers at this place. In the course of time these piers became dilapidated, and while in such condition the sand from accretions drifted over them into the channel, thereby virtually closing the harbor to middling and large sized vessels. Within a few years the Government has rebuilt these piers and the light-house, and has recently cleared nearly one-half of the channel of sand to a proper depth. We deem it to be an absolute necessity that the remaining portion of the channel be likewise cleared of sand; and it is to this fact we desire to ask your particular attention. If this bank of sand, thus formed and left, be not removed soon, it will gradually be distributed by the action of the water over the whole bottom of the channel; thus a portion of the work already done will be actually lost, and the harbor again practically closed against vessels of heavy burden.

While these statements are true and important in regard to this harbor in the past, we believe them to be very much more important in view of its future. For heretofore it has had no interior outlet, and besides having been a port of shelter and safety, which is a very considerable item of itself, it has only exported the products and imported the demands of this immediate locality, and these, even, are credited to another port; but now, by the completion of the Sodus Point and Southern Railroad, (and the prospective completion of two other railroads to this bay,) it has such an outlet. The harbor is now connected with the commercial net-work of the country, and its business must rapidly increase very many fold, and we are confident the direction of the trade in coal, iron, and iron ore to this port will be immediate, and that of grain, lumber, &c., will soon follow; for it is a fact, which you may not have noticed, that the distance of Big Sodus Harbor from the coal-fields and furnaces of Pennsylvania and Southern New York, via the Lehigh Valley and Northern Central Railroads, is less by twenty miles than by any other avenue.

While we are aware that the policy of the Government at present is retrenchment, we feel excusable in asking an appropriation, first, because of the particular facts above named; and, secondly, while other places in this vicinity at your last session received liberal supplies, Big Sodus received none. Therefore we join the petition of the Government engineer in charge, Colonel J. M. Wilson, and support him in recommending an appropriation of $30,000 for this harbor, believing it to be an urgent commercial necessity.

FREE EXCHANGE OF NEWSPAPERS.

Mr. FIELD. I ask unanimous consent to present concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, in favor of the free transmission of newspaper exchanges and of newspapers within the county where published, for reference to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. SPEER. I object; those resolutions have already been presented a number of times and referred.

The SPEAKER. The rule is for one member of a State to present the resolutions of its Legislature.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE SAGINAW RIVER.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan, by unanimous consent, presented concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, asking Congress for an appropriation to aid in the improvement of the navigation of the Saginaw River; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I now insist on my motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 27, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Commissioner of Agriculture, asking that Congress may authorize the printing of twenty-five thousand copies of the Annual Report of the Department of Agriculture for that Department; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of citizens of West Virginia, soldiers in the late war, praying the enactment of a law granting $100 bounty to all soldiers, sailors, and marines who entered the service prior to September 23, 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting a petition of officers of the Sixth Infantry, asking that troops serving on the frontier be placed on a better footing with regard to leaves of absence; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of the citizens of Portland, Oregon, in favor of aid by Congress to the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad, for which a bill is now pending before Congress; which were referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, requesting Congress at its present session to adopt such measures as shall secure the speedy construction of a ship-canal around Niagara Falls; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a petition of citizens of Michigan, late members of the Fifth Regiment of Michigan Cavalry Volunteers in the late rebellion, praying payment of balances claimed to be due them for services rendered as second lieutenants; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SARGENT. I present to the Senate a petition of citizens of Round Valley, California, which states at considerable length the circumstances under which settlements were made by them in that valley, and also recites the legislation of the 3d of March, 1873, by which Congress provided for the sale at $1.25 an acre, to the actual occupants or settlers, of the surplus lands not needed for the purposes of an Indian reservation. They state, what I believe to be the fact, that a bill is now pending in Congress to change the price which they were required to pay, and which they have paid, and for which payment they have received duplicate certificates, from $1.25 an acre to $5 an acre, as they say for insufficient reasons. They allege that it would be a measure of oppression, that it would depopulate the valley, that the land would pass into the hands of speculators and capitalists, to the injury of actual occupants who have rights which have been recognized by the Government. This petition, which is forcible in its character, both in its facts and in the manner of their presentation, is signed by about 125 settlers; and in addition to them by other prominent citizens of the county to the extent of some 12 or 14, indorsing the statements in the petition and joining with the petitioners in urging that Congress rest upon the legislation so far had. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, which I believe has the other bill before it.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the memorial of James F. Baldwin, who recites that the people of the United States in 1872 adopted a resolution proposed by the republican national convention, which resolution related to the matter of bounty to soldiers and sailors, and which he thinks requires the legislation pointed out in his memorial. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of George Richards, praying for an increase of pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1948) granting a pension to Mary J. Blood, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1945) granting a pension to Juliet E. Hall, daughter of William Hall, late colonel of the Eleventh Regiment of Iowa Infantry, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 299) to establish the Bismarck land district, in the Territory of Dakota, reported it without amendment.

NEW LAND DISTRICT IN OREGON.

Mr. KELLY. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 381) to create an additional land district in the State of Oregon, to be called the Dalles land district, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and to recommend its passage. I should like the Senate to indulge me by action on this bill at the present time.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 635) authorizing M. P. Turner and his associates and assigns to prospect for and mine coal and other mineral in and under the beds of the Des Moines and Coon Rivers, in Polk County, Iowa; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GORDON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 636) to authorize the settlement between the Western and Atlantic Railroad, of Georgia, and the United States, upon the same basis that a settlement was made between certain railroads in the State of Tennessee and the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SAINT LOUIS BRIDGE.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to furnish the Senate with a copy of the report of the board of United States engineers who made examination of the bridge over the Mississippi River at Saint Louis, Missouri.

DELINQUENCIES OF GOVERNMENT OFFICERS.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer the following resolution, which I ask to have printed and laid on the table:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the Senate a statement in detail showing the amounts due and yet unpaid to the Government from January, 1865, to the present time from paymasters, quartermasters, commissaries, collectors of internal revenue, collectors of customs, officers of the Freedmen's Bureau, or any other officer or set of officers whose accounts are under his supervision; that he further inform the Senate how such of the delinquencies as have been arranged have been settled, whether by compromise, dismissal, or otherwise; and that he further inform the Senate the names of all of said delinquents, and from what States they were appointed, and whether there are any suits now pending for the recovery of such moneys, and, if so, against whom, and for what amount.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator from West Virginia ask action now upon that resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He asks that it be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. CONKLING. I make no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution lies over. The Senator from West Virginia moves the resolution be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

THE MORNING HOUR.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I am directed by the Committee on the Revision of the Rules to report the following additional rule:

During the present session of Congress, one hour and one-half, commencing at each daily session of the Senate, shall be designated as the morning hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to the consideration of that for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed rule will lie over.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. LEWIS, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

COWAN AND DICKINSON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Secretary will report the bills on the Calendar in their order.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 63) for the relief of Perez Dickinson, the surviving partner of James Cowan, deceased, heretofore trading and doing business under the firm name and style of Cowan & Dickinson, of Knoxville, East Tennessee.

Mr. PRATT. That bill belongs to a class of cases that will undoubtedly give rise to a great deal of discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator objects, the bill will be laid aside.

Mr. PRATT. I do not object to its present consideration, and I do not wish it to lose its place on the Calendar. It is a case where under the directions of General Burnside, when he was commanding at Knoxville in 1863, a large amount of cotton belonging to the firm of Cowan & Dickinson was seized and placed on the fortifications.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator that debate is out of order. If the Senator objects, the bill will be laid aside; if not, it is the first bill on the Calendar, and it will be before the Senate.

Mr. GORDON. I move to take up the two bills that were objected to yesterday. The objection to their consideration will not be renewed this morning. I refer to Senate bill No. 334, and House bill No. 2547, removing the disabilities of Thomas Hardeman, jr., of Georgia, and William L. Cabell, of Texas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is at present a bill before the Senate. After that the Senator can make his motion.

Mr. PRATT. I do not ask for the postponement of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the bill will be read at length.

Mr. CHANDLER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan objects, and the bill will be laid aside.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. GORDON. I now move to take up the two bills which were laid aside yesterday. The objection will not be renewed. I will first move to take up House bill No. 2547.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2547) to remove from political disabilities Thomas Hardeman, jr., of Georgia.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That bill and another like it were reported adversely by the Committee on the Judiciary. I know of no special reason why the disability of these individuals should not be removed; but I am not aware since the general-amnesty bill was passed that Congress has removed disabilities from any of that class who were excepted from that general-amnesty bill, to wit, officers of the United States Army who went over to the adverse party, members of Congress, &c.; and unless Congress is prepared to adopt the policy of granting amnesty to that class, these bills ought not to pass. But it is a fair question for the Senate to consider. The reasons that moved the Senate when that general-amnesty bill was passed in excepting this class still exist.

I think it is right to make this statement to the Senate, that they may see the importance of this measure as a precedent. I do not think that there is anything peculiar in the case of these individuals which does not apply to all of the class who were excepted from the general-amnesty bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I hope this bill will pass. Admitting all that the Senator from New Jersey has said, Congress has, since the passage of the general-amnesty bill, granted relief by special bills to a number of officers of the Army and Navy who resigned and went into the confederate army. That was right and proper. Why, then, object to the pending bill? My opinion is that the cardinal rule of all free government ought to be justice. That should be one of the great objects and ends of all free government. When we find that major-generals in the confederate army have been relieved by special acts from disabilities, many of whom are now holding office of trust and profit at this time under this Administration, why should the Senate undertake to refuse to grant the same measure of relief to others equally meritorious, and who have been quiet and loyal since the close of the war; gallant men, who did nothing in originating the rebellion, and who were not half so prominent in its prosecution as others who have been relieved and who are now holding distinguished positions of profit under this Administration? Is this just? Is it generous? I cannot think so.

Mr. President, I repeat that my humble belief is that if we desire to attach the entire people to the unity of this Government we should be just as well as generous. Do not, I beseech you, make fish of one and flesh of another. Let our legislation operate equally upon all in the same class of disabilities. There have been quite a number of ex-members of the Thirty-fifth and Thirty-sixth Congresses relieved since the general-amnesty bill was passed. Why, then, exclude Colonel Hardeman? I agree with the President of the United States in his message that we should welcome back every confederate by a removal of all disabilities. Every day's delay in the passage of such an act is one of injustice to many brave and gallant men. Let us extend amnesty to all who are willing and ask this Government to remove their disabilities. Do not discriminate, but promptly relieve all, and make them feel by your legislation that they are citizens again of the American Republic, possessing every privilege that any other citizen is entitled to. I sincerely trust that the Senate will pass this bill and extend to these petitioners the same grace which has already at this very session been extended to others occupying their position.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, the arguments in favor of universal amnesty are familiar to every one, and certainly have great force. The only objection to be urged to it, as it seems to me, at this day, so many years after the war, is that it may be extended to some who would afterward say, "We did not desire it; we asked no favors from your Government; we did not petition you to relieve us; we look upon your Government as we always did; we were rebels, and we claim still to be rebels in sentiment." There is an objection to a sweeping law that shall remove the disabilities, those few that remain, upon persons who might assume that attitude. But, sir, where a person, no matter what offense he may have committed heretofore in the line of what he thought, though wrongfully, was his duty as a citizen of a Southern State, comes and asks the Congress of the United States to relieve him from his disabilities, then this objection is removed, and I can conceive of no other why the disabilities should not be removed and these bills passed.

I understand in this case there is a petition from the individual who asks to be relieved. I further understand that there is a voluntary petition on the part of a great many republicans who know this person, and know him to be a good citizen; that since the war he has evinced a purpose to conform to the laws; that he is in many senses of the word, and the best senses of the word, reconstructed. These facts certainly make an exception in his favor from the principle I have stated; and I trust in all such cases the Senate of the United States will show that it is able to rise above the feelings which were created by the war and grant amnesty and complete amnesty to every one who will place himself within these conditions.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Inasmuch as this name comes from Texas, I feel——

Mr. GORDON. No; this is the Georgia case; this is not the Cabell matter.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Well, it is in the same line, and though I was under a slight mistake, I am still in favor of the bill, and I am for the Texan particularly. I wish his disabilities removed, as those of all other Texans have been, placing him on the same footing; and I think he will be a better man. That is the idea; that he will be more liberal if he is not kept under this restraint. That is the difficulty with us. I hope he will become a good citizen, regretting what he has done in the past. I am for relieving him and all others.

Mr. WRIGHT. Having reported this bill from the Judiciary Committee adversely, I think it is due to myself to say one word. I have not in my mind at this time any case since the general amnesty bill was passed where disabilities have been removed in the classes of cases referred to by the Senator from Kentucky. I do not say that there have not been such bills passed. If so, however, I say that they have been passed either because of the peculiar circumstances of the case, or because the attention of the Senate was not directed to the question before it.

Now, we have reported this bill back from the Judiciary Committee and have called the attention of the Senate to the question that is involved. Whether they propose to remove disabilities in each and every case as it may arise, without reference to the peculiar circumstances, or whether it be better to pass a general amnesty bill so as to include all, is the question that is now presented to the Senate; and a majority of the Judiciary Committee, as I stated yesterday morning, were of opinion that it was not advisable to recommend the passage of this bill. They submit the question to the Senate. The Senate understand the circumstances. If they shall be overruled, the committee will take it as the sense of the Senate to report such bills back favorably again, unless there should be some reason why they should not be so reported. I believe that is the exact position of the question.

Mr. THURMAN. As this bill comes from the Judiciary Committee, I wish to say that I was not in the committee at the time the agreement to report upon it adversely was arrived at. I am in favor of the bill and have been all the time. But I must say that I infinitely prefer the passage of a general amnesty bill. I have said again and again that I for one am sick, I might almost say disgusted, with this peddling out of amnesty by piecemeal. I think it unworthy of the Government, and I saw with pleasure the recommendation which has been referred to, of the Executive, in favor of a general amnesty bill. But as Congress does not seem disposed to pass it, or to pass it speedily, I shall continue to vote as heretofore for amnesty in all cases that are presented, unless there is some extraordinary reason why I should not so vote; and no such case has yet come to my knowledge.

The question being put, the President pro tempore declared that the bill was passed.

Mr. GORDON. I move——

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to remind the Chair that the passage must be by a two-thirds vote. I do not say there was not a two-thirds vote, but I suggest to the Chair that the record should show that fact by the announcement of the vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question again. [Putting the question.] It is the opinion of the Chair that more than two-thirds have voted for the bill. The bill has passed.

Mr. GORDON. I move now to take up the Senate bill for the relief of William L. Cabell.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 334) to remove the disabilities of William L. Cabell, of Texas.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed by a two-thirds vote.

CITIZENS OF LOUDOUN COUNTY.

Mr. BOGY. I should like to appeal to the Senate to take up a bill of great importance, Senate bill No. 32, obviating the necessity of issuing patents for certain private land claims in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I hope that will not be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut objects.

Mr. BOGY. I will state, for the information of the Senator from Connecticut——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is out of order. The next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 48) for the relief of loyal citizens of Loudoun County, Virginia, therein named.

Mr. BOREMAN. As the purpose is to expedite business, I will state that this is one of that class of cases in regard to property in the insurrectionary States about which there will probably be controversy. I am satisfied it will be objected to before we get through with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object?

Mr. BOREMAN. I think it had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object?

Mr. BOREMAN. I think it would be better to pass it over. I reported the bill and am in favor of it; but I am satisfied——

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 423) relating to the equitable and legal rights of parties in possession of certain lands and improvements thereon in California, and to provide jurisdiction to determine those rights.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask if that is about the San José reservation? If so, I know it will lead to debate, and therefore I object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

NATHAN COLE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 379) for the relief of Nathan Cole, late captain Twenty-third Regiment Veteran Reserve Corps; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to credit Nathan Cole, late captain and brevet major Twenty-third Regiment Veteran Reserve Corps, in the settlement of his accounts with the United States, with the sum of $120.80, collected by him while acting as agent of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, at Lewisville, Arkansas, in 1867, and lost in transmission to the proper receiving and disbursing officer at Little Rock.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not desire to say anything upon this bill, but as I suppose that anything is in order when a bill is under consideration before it shall have passed from the Senate, I wish to say that the bill reported by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] and the bill reported by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] have both gone off the Calendar this morning, and as there are a number of other bills of a similar character involving questions that will give rise to debate reported from the Committee on Claims, I shall, soon after we reach the termination of the present financial question, ask the Senate to fix a day when the bills reported from that committee shall be considered.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OFFICERS AND CREW OF WYOMING AND TA KIANG.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 342) for the relief of the officers and crew of the United States ship Wyoming and Ta Kiang.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think that bill had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be laid aside.

WILLIAM H. DENNISTON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1224) for the relief of William H. Denniston, late an acting second lieutenant Seventieth New York Volunteers, which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Paymaster of the Army to allow and pay to W. H. Denniston, late an acting second lieutenant of Company D, Seventieth New York Volunteers, out of the appropriations for the pay of the Army, the pay and allowance allowed by law to a second lieutenant of infantry, from the 24th of December, 1861, to the 15th of July, 1862, he having actually served in that capacity and having received no pay therefor.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. BOGY. I ask the Senate now to take up the bill (S. No. 32) obviating the necessity of issuing patents for certain private land claims in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes. It is a local bill, and it will take but a few moments to dispose of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves to postpone the Calendar and proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Several SENATORS. Let us go on with the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the question to the Senate. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The motion was not agreed to.

PRESIDIO RESERVATION.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 108) to relinquish the interest of the United States in certain lands to the city and county of San Francisco, in the State of California.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill will be laid aside.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask the Senator to withdraw his objection until an explanation of the bill can be made, which I can make in two minutes, I think.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw the objection for that purpose.

Mr. BOGY. I object. Objection was made to my bill, and let us proceed in regular order.

Mr. SARGENT. I trust the Senator will not object because somebody else, not myself, objected to some bill of his. This bill comes up now in regular order. I have not made any factious opposition to any Senator's bill. The Senator has a right to object, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is proceeding under an understanding that bills objected to shall be laid aside. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WRIGHT. I object. I am satisfied that the bill will give rise to debate.

Mr. SARGENT. I thought I had leave to explain it for two minutes. If not, I still ask for that privilege.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Another Senator objects.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask the Senator to withdraw his objection in order that I may explain the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa withdraw his objection?

Mr. WRIGHT. I shall not withdraw the objection to the consideration of the bill. If the Senate think proper to hear an explanation, I will not object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The consideration of the bill being objected to, the next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

Mr. SARGENT. Will it be in order to move to take up this bill in order that I may explain it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order for the Senator to move to postpone the Calendar and proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Then I will do that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves to postpone the Calendar, and proceed to the consideration of the bill just passed over.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 108) to relinquish the interest of the United States in certain lands to the city and county of San Francisco, in the State of California.

The bill proposes to relinquish and grant all the right and title of the United States to the following-described portion of the military reservation, known as the Presidio, or Fort Point reservation, situated in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, to that city and county, and its successors, for the benefit of persons who, if the lands had not been reserved for public use, would have been entitled thereto under the ordinance numbered 800, of the city of San Francisco, ratified by the act of the Legislature of the State, approved on the 27th of March, 1868, entitled "An act to confirm a certain order passed by the board of supervisors of the city of San Francisco," relating to these promises, and being more particularly described as follows: Commencing at the southeasterly corner of the said Presidio, or Fort Point reservation, and thence running in a direct line due north to the shore-line of the bay of San Francisco; thence westerly along the said shore-line to a point eighty feet, more or less, west of the easterly line of the said Presidio, or Fort Point military reservation, as heretofore established by the United States authorities, said eighty feet, more or less, being granted for a roadway, or street, called Lyon street; thence southerly to a point on the southerly line of said reservation, eighty feet, more or less, and westerly from the point of commencement, said eighty feet, more or less, being for a street, named Lyon street, to conform to the plan of the city map of streets of San Francisco outside of the reservation, said plan being now on file in the office of the War Department, in the city of Washington; but all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this are declared to be inapplicable to the lands by it relinquished and granted.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SARGENT. I will explain the bill in a moment if the Senator will allow me to do so. Some twenty-odd years ago the United States in marking one boundary of the Presidio ran what it supposed to be a due north line. The city, the citizens, and everybody else acquiesced in that, and the Government marked its line by a fence, a substantial fence, which separated its possessions from the outside world. Nobody was dissatisfied. Subsequently, some dozen years thereafter, an engineer went to run this line of boundary and discovered that there was a slight error in fixing the true meridian, being the difference between the magnetic meridian and the true meridian, a difference which made a small triangular piece. This piece was taken off people's houses and gardens and lots which they had occupied for a dozen years under undisputed title. The whole Presidio is from fifteen to seventeen hundred acres; and this triangle is some fifty or sixty acres, which the Government by moving its fences on to these people's possessions takes possession of. It plainly does not need this land, because it has nearly seventeen hundred acres there; and for military purposes it cannot possibly want more than four or five hundred acres at the very outside.

This hardship, this resuming possession of the land under such circumstances, has operated injuriously. I have no doubt the last line was the correct one. I frankly confess that. But the matter was called to the attention of the War Department and of Congress as possessing peculiar equities. The proposition was submitted to the Engineer Corps and to the War Department, and I have here before me their letters, wherein they warmly recommend that this relief be granted to those persons who suddenly were thus put to this disadvantage.

That is all there is of the bill. It simply covers a little triangular piece, nothing at one point and going up gradually increasing at the upper side, the difference being made, as I say, by a simple change of the meridian.

Mr. SHERMAN. What are the degrees of variation?

Mr. SARGENT. Very slight. It was simply a variation of the compass. This map, from the Engineer Corps, shows the lines. The fact is that the bill does not work any hardship to the Government, while it gives relief to the occupants. General Humphreys, the Engineer-in-Chief, having referred this matter to the local engineer of the United States, Colonel Alexander, and receiving his favorable report, recommends it, and so does the War Department. I have here the letter written by Mr. Alexander, lieutenant-colonel of engineers, to General Humphreys, which states the facts fully, and I will read it.

Mr. STEWART. I believe there is not a man in the world who will look at the map before the Senator who will not vote for the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SARGENT. Unquestionably the bill is right. It is reported favorably and unanimously, I believe, by the Committee on Military Affairs, who make a written report in its favor. I will read the documents.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There is no objection. We do not need to hear more about it.

Mr. SARGENT. It is suggested there is no further necessity for explanation. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THURMAN. Now that the Senate has passed the Calendar to take up this fifty-acre bill——

Mr. SARGENT. No; it came up in order on the Calendar. It was simply objected to, and I asked that it might be considered nevertheless.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I have nothing to say.

ASBURY DICKINS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 171) for the benefit of the legatees of Asbury Dickins, deceased.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Let the report be read in that case.

Mr. SCOTT. That bill is reported adversely.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senator will allow that bill to be acted on.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I withdraw the objection to its consideration; but let the report be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the report, submitted by Mr. SCOTT from the Committee on Claims on the 17th of February, but before concluding,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the Senate resumes the unfinished business of yesterday.

CURRENCY AND BANKING.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 617) to provide for the redemption and reissue of United States notes, and for free banking, the question being on the amendment of Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, to the first section of the bill as amended.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, it is not the purpose of this amendment to embarrass the bill; but it is clearly a proper amendment, as I suppose, for I do not understand that it is the purpose of the gentlemen who sustain the first section as it has been adopted to leave power in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury to go and buy bonds at 115, 117, or 120 per cent. and pay for them in United States legal-tender notes. I think that ought to be prohibited. Nor can I suppose that it is intended that this shall be a resource of the Treasury in lieu of taxation, in lieu of the ordinary revenues of the country. I suppose that it is intended that we shall keep our expenditures within the receipts of the Treasury, and that by no possible contingency are we to make paper money to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government. I therefore propose the amendment in entire good faith, and I cannot perceive any valid objection to it.

Mr. LOGAN. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the first section of the bill, as amended, the following words:

> But no part of the same shall be used in the purchase of bonds of the United States at above par, nor for the current expenses of the Government.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not exactly understand the Senator's suggestion in reference to taxes. I should like to know what he meant by that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not know that I can explain it any more explicitly than I did. I merely say that I suppose it is intended to put the Treasury in a position, by way of taxation, to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government, and that we are not at this day, in a time of profound peace, to set the Treasury presses in motion and authorize them to make paper money to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government.

Mr. LOGAN. If I understand this amendment—I may not understand it as the Senator from Vermont intends it to mean—it is directly the opposite of what the majority of the Senate decided yesterday. The Senate decided yesterday that $400,000,000 should be the maximum amount of United States notes; of course the maximum amount in circulation. That is the meaning of it clearly. Now, this proposition is to restrict that so that the $18,000,000 now in the Treasury Department shall neither be paid out in the purchase of bonds nor for the current expenses of the Government. We might just as well have adopted the provision of the committee yesterday, declaring that $382,000,000 should be the maximum amount, because that is what this amendment means; nothing more, nothing less. I do not insinuate or intimate that any Senator in this Chamber would try to impose upon any other Senator; that would be a presumption that Senators might be imposed upon; but it does seem to me that there ought to be such a thing as fairness at least in this Chamber. If the majority of the Senate vote that $400,000,000 shall be the maximum amount, we ought to rest at that and be satisfied with it, without undertaking to hamper it in such a manner as to produce just such a result as the committee attempted to produce by fixing $382,000,000. That is the meaning of this; and it means that although the Senate adopted $400,000,000 as the maximum amount, yet it shall not be that, but $382,000,000. That is, in my judgment, tampering with the majority of the Senate in this Chamber in such a manner as ought not to be done. I think good faith ought to be kept with all of us.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I think the Senator misunderstands the effect of this bill with this amendment. He seems to think that under the bill with this amendment no more than $382,000,000 can be circulated; but the amendment provides that it can be, provided the Secretary can buy the public debt at par.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senator, has he ever known or does he expect the time to come, while gold-bearing bonds are worth what they are, when you can buy them at par with greenbacks? Does he expect any such thing?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. We hope to get the greenbacks at par before we get through with this bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. That is something you will not accomplish, however.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I think there is no difficulty in adding the provision which is made here, that the Treasury shall not issue legal-tender notes for the purchase of United States bonds unless it can buy them at par. I see no objection to that amendment; and if the Secretary can do that, I am sure $400,000,000 can be issued.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Let us take one thing at a time. I will therefore modify my amendment by striking out all after the words "United States;" so as to read: "But no part of the same shall be used in the purchase of bonds of the United States."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Vermont. It seems to me the effect of the amendment would be to prohibit the purchase of United States bonds hereafter unless they are purchased with gold.

Mr. LOGAN. That is precisely what it means.

Mr. ALLISON. If it is the intention of the committee to prohibit the further purchase of United States bonds, that is one thing.

Mr. BAYARD. I merely rise to say a word. I confess I do not understand the precise result—I say nothing of the intent—of the amendment of my friend from Vermont. I am opposed to expansion, and have signified it by my votes; but there is one thing that I consider worse than expansion, and that is, expansion and contraction at the will of any one man. If this $400,000,000 is to be authorized by the vote of Congress, I want it all to go out. I do not want $18,000,000 of it to be played fast and loose with at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury; and I had prepared an amendment, which is now lying on my table, for the purpose of securing the emission of this $18,000,000 and its use in some way. I would use it either to purchase the bonds of the Government or to meet the current expenses of the Government; but I do not desire to see this $18,000,000 take the shape of what is called a reserve. I think the great merit of government is its certainty. Laws without certainty lack their greatest essential. I am unwilling to see the finances of the country, the abundance or scarcity of money, left subject to the thumb and finger of a single individual in the Treasury Department. If the object is in any way, directly or indirectly, to constitute this $18,000,000 a fund that is to ebb and flow at the will of the Secretary of the Treasury, I shall feel obliged, with my present views, to oppose it.

Mr. SCHURZ. Did I hear the Senator from Delaware say that he had drawn an amendment to meet his view? In that case I would respectfully ask him to give us that amendment for information.

Mr. BAYARD. For the purpose of information, I will read as part of my remarks the amendment I had drafted:

> That the amount of Treasury notes now in the Treasury, over and above the $382,000,000 outstanding, shall not be held as a reserve, but shall be forthwith used either to redeem the public debt or to meet the current payments for the public service.

That was my idea.

Mr. SHERMAN. As the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Vermont are both gentlemen occupying the same position on the main question, contraction or expansion, the counter-propositions from them on this subject will probably show the Senate that on the whole it is better not to say anything about it. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont, literally construed, would prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from using these notes to pay current expenses. That was not his design, clearly; but his intention was simply that this excess above the present amount outstanding should not be used for the purpose of increasing the public debt in the shape of bonds and United States notes.

But, sir, it is impossible, in the nature of things, for you to fix the amount that the Secretary of the Treasury must have on hand to meet the ordinary current expenses. Sometimes he must have $10,000,000; ordinarily $14,000,000; sometimes, as now, it is reduced to $3,000,000. From the nature of things it is not possible to fix the amount. For instance, at the end of every quarter, when the pensions have to be paid, and when many items of the expenses of the Government have to be paid, the Secretary of the Treasury, as a prudent man, must have a pretty large amount, not in reserve exactly, but on hand, just as a good business man would have when his debts are about to become due; it may be $2,000,000, or $10,000,000, or $20,000,000. Therefore to require, according to the plan of the Senator from Delaware, to have this whole amount paid out now in the purchase of a fixed debt, so that we shall have no balance on hand to meet current expenditures, it seems to me, would not be wise.

As to the other point, the proposition of the Senator from Vermont, it does not seem to be material. The Secretary has got to buy bonds, because there is a sinking fund of $30,000,000, and he is bound by law to purchase every year $30,000,000, if for no other purpose, simply to maintain the sinking fund. That he is bound to do. Whether he pays for it in gold, or pays for it according to the Secretary's plan, in currency, is not very material. It is only a mode of keeping the accounts. I think I would prefer to buy the bonds in gold; but instead of that he sells the gold and gets currency, and buys the bonds with currency. The only difference would be, that if the proposition of the Senator from Vermont should prevail, he would pay the gold out directly in the purchase of bonds, instead of selling the gold for currency, and then with the currency buying the bonds. I do not think there is much difference in these two modes of conducting the operations of the Treasury Department. The present Secretary and the last one have always bought bonds with currency. The former Secretary, Mr. McCulloch, and Governor Chase, always bought them with gold. That is just the difference. I do not think it makes any practical difference in the result. But Secretary BOUTWELL seemed to think that it was better for the interests of the Government to sell the gold and buy the bonds with currency. The operation is the same. The gold, of which we have a surplus revenue, is applied to the purchase of bonds; and whether it be done through a double operation or not is a matter of indifference.

I think, therefore, it would be better to let the section stand as it is. We have fixed the maximum amount of United States legal-tender notes, and it is utterly impossible now to direct the application of the amount between $382,000,000 and $400,000,000. My inclination, therefore, is to vote against both amendments.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I concur in the views expressed by the chairman of the Committee on Finance; and were it necessary to express the idea further, I should also concur in the proposed amendment read by the Senator from Delaware. But as I understand the first section of the bill as it now stands, under the vote of yesterday, it expresses all that would be covered by the amendment suggested by the Senator from Delaware.

Now, sir, from what has been said by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, it seems that different Secretaries act differently under the same statute. In providing for the sinking fund one buys bonds in gold, and the other in currency. I should prefer to leave the Secretary untrammeled on this subject. The object in selling gold is to obtain the premium on it; and as the premium changes, the Secretary ought to exercise his discretion. In this case, by prohibiting him from purchasing in currency, you confine him to coin. If you leave the bill to stand as it was amended yesterday, you leave it to his own discretion.

Now, sir, I prefer to let the thing stand precisely where we placed it yesterday, and let the Secretary of the Treasury, whose duty it is to do so, assume and exercise the responsibility and be so held before the country. I do not wish by any vote of mine to imply any instruction or restriction to the Secretary. I propose by our action of yesterday to have it stated frankly to him that we have decided that not $356,000,000, not $382,000,000, but $400,000,000 shall be the maximum amount of United States notes for circulation. I am sorry that the words "for circulation" were stricken out. If they were retained it would be clear, and there would no longer be any question upon its face as to construction. We have had enough doubt upon the question of maximum, and we have heard Senators here divided on the question of the authority to issue the $44,000,000. Now we propose to declare the maximum, and we are asked to restrict and raise the doubt again. I think the simple statement, as we placed it yesterday, that it should be four hundred millions, covers the whole ground, and then if the Secretary should see fit to hold in the Treasury a large amount of currency from general circulation, he will be held responsible to and meet the just criticism of the country.

Mr. SCHURZ. In one respect I agree with the Senator from Michigan, and that is, that one of the two amendments suggested here ought not to be added to the first section of this bill. I think Senators who voted for the increase of the currency to $400,000,000 had an object in view. The object, as they stated to us in their speeches, was to give greater financial facilities to the people of the West and South. If that object is to be attained by the first section of the bill as it now stands, then of course some means ought to be provided by which the money now to be issued shall be prevented from staying in the East, but shall go to the West and the South, to be there distributed among those people who need money. There are two ways, it seems to me, in which the eighteen millions can be put into circulation: first, by buying bonds; and, secondly, in defraying the current expenses of the Government.

Yesterday I read an extract from the speech of Mr. Chittenden, delivered at the financial meeting in New York, showing that while a speculator, a broker, running his business on a capital of $100,000, could get a loan of $14,000,000 from national banks, a firm having been engaged in legitimate business for ten years, with a capital of half a million, could not at the same time get a loan of $24,000; whereupon the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] said that this fact proved the necessity of not keeping the currency in New York, but diffusing it. Well, gentlemen, what are you proposing here? If you issue the eighteen millions of currency by buying bonds, what will be the effect? You will send it right into Wall street, and there pour it into the very hot-bed of speculation. As I showed you in one of my former speeches, of the whole $25,000,000 issued by the Secretary of the Treasury after the panic, only $2,000,000 went beyond Philadelphia, Boston, and New York, and those $2,000,000, in all probability, remained in Providence and in the cities of Connecticut; so that if you send out this $18,000,000 by the purchase of bonds, certainly the people of the West and South will derive no benefit from it at all.

In the second place, if the money is paid out in defraying the current expenses of the Government, what will be the consequence? We all know that most of the money which the Government spends is spent in the East and not in the West and South, and the result will be the same. I would therefore suggest that the majority of the Senate, who have voted to fix the maximum amount of the currency at $400,000,000, instruct the Secretary of the Treasury themselves how to issue that money, so that it may accomplish the purpose which they contended for in their speeches, namely, increase the volume of currency at the disposal of the people of the West and South.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. When the Senator from Missouri read that extract from a speech made at the New York meeting I could not forego the opportunity of calling the attention of the Senate and the country to the fact which he disclosed through that speech, that he corroborated the position those in favor of expansion have taken throughout this discussion. When it was stated that there was a large surplus of money in New York we met it by saying that gilt-edged paper in legitimate business channels could not reach that surplus, but that speculators on call loans could, and therefore the accumulation of $25,000,000 there was no benefit to the country. I alluded to it for that purpose, and it was a rare opportunity. It is not often that the astute Senator from Missouri leaves the laches as he did at that time, and I at once called the attention of the Senate to the fact, fastening the argument on the side of the expansionists. It was simply for that purpose that I called attention to it.

I am very well aware that the purchase of bonds is made in New York. Why? Because more bonds are held there, and parties holding bonds and desiring to sell them, send them to the metropolitan market. There is the place where bonds are more advantageously sold, and money accumulates there. That is the strongest argument why we want another method of supplying currency, and that may be effected through the national system by diffusing the currency westward and southward. Money in New York will not be held when it does not pay, and sooner or later it will diffuse itself elsewhere.

I would not limit the Secretary of the Treasury. When the Senator throws the responsibility of this section upon the majority here, we are willing to shoulder it; and more than that, I will say to the Senator that when the Secretary of the Treasury finds himself in doubt and invites the majority here to instruct him we shall be pleased to do so. We understand the section adopted, and know just what is wanted with it. But my apprehension of the judgment and intelligence of the Secretary is that, left to that section, he will understand that he has no right to hold a large accumulation of currency in his vaults, but will keep no more than to meet the demands upon the Treasury. When it exceeds that necessary amount he will pay it out, and if necessary buy bonds with currency, in keeping up the sinking fund. The expenditures of the Government are made all over the country, and the money will be diffused in their payment by the Government. I prefer, therefore, to localize responsibility just where it belongs. We as a branch of the legislative department have instructed him through the adopted section. He, on the other part, as the executive officer must carry out that section, and if he assumes a responsibility that is not covered by the section, he is responsible for his acts. There is where we wish to lodge the responsibility, not let it rest on the shadow of a doubt expressed in this Chamber or in Congress.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President, the logic of the Senator from Michigan is perfectly admirable. He said that the issue of $25,000,000 of currency which staid in the banks of the East only served to increase the accumulation of currency there, which benefits and encourages speculation and injures legitimate business, so that a speculator can get money for his operations and a legitimate business man cannot. That is true. But, now, what does the Senator propose in order to obviate that difficulty? To increase the currency to $400,000,000; to issue eighteen millions, in addition to the volume now out, by the purchase of bonds in Wall street, which will only swell the accumulation already existing there and aggravate the evil consequences of it.

He desires to leave the responsibility for that operation with the Secretary of the Treasury—a responsibility which I should think would be a very hard one for that officer to bear—of so distributing the currency (and here the question is not upon national banks, but upon the issue of $18,000,000 additional to what we have now) that the object which the Senator from Michigan has in view, namely, that the people of the West and South may be best benefited, shall be attained. If he has no instructions to offer to the Secretary of the Treasury about that subject, I may perhaps, before we are through with this bill, offer some suggestions in this respect myself.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I am afraid that our friends in this Chamber who are represented by the Senator from Michigan will realize again the illustration of the fable of Tantalus. The draught that they seek will ever be escaping their lips. The Senator says now the object is to reach a plethora of money in the West and South by means of banking currency; and how are they to get that? They must go to New York, which they admit to be the great money center, where these bonds find their best market and where everybody must purchase; in other words, where capital has accumulated in the shape of bonds of the Government. They will go to New York, and for $115 of currency they will obtain bonds to the amount of $100, upon which they will have 90 per cent. of banking currency issued to them under one of the provisions of this bill; so that in order to obtain their ninety dollars they will have to give up $115 of the very thing which they say is so much to be desired by them; and when they have gotten their ninety dollars of notes they will take the same course and flow by the same current and under the same forces to the same money center, to the place where he now goes as his source of supply. That I believe will be the result, and I think experience will simply repeat itself on that question.

But, sir, I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri one question. Admitting the fact, unfortunately, that it would be so, that there is here $18,000,000 of currency additionally authorized by this act of Congress, there is an increase of the volume of the currency over and above all that is admitted legally to be out now by anybody of $18,000,000. What is the Senator's design in the treatment of that fund? Does he design it be held, or how does he design it to be used? I can understand now better than when first offered the operation of the amendment of the Senator from Vermont forbidding the use of any portion of this $18,000,000 for the purchase of the bonds of the United States in the creation of a sinking fund to enforce the purchase of those bonds in gold; and that, I think, would be a very wholesome operation. The sale of gold pro tanto would result in gain to the United States, and we should do what we can do to purchase our bonds at par in gold, instead of purchasing them at something far over the premium on gold and silver in paper.

But I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri, what is to be the result under his theory? What use will he make of this additional $18,000,000? Does he not agree with me that expansion and contraction at a single man's will is worse than expansion by itself? How does he propose that this $18,000,000 shall be utilized? It has been authorized, and that means, of course, for issue in some shape or form. Why not, therefore, insist that it shall be issued, and after that allow the natural ebb and flow of Treasury receipts and expenditures to produce that necessary balance which the Senator from Ohio says ought to be in the Treasury to meet the emergencies of demand upon the Treasury, and which, I think, would be accomplished just as it was before? When we had a volume of $356,000,000, the ebb and flow of receipt and expenditure continued. The result was to leave in the Treasury sums varying from three to fourteen million dollars, and the Secretary of the Treasury necessarily in the very nature of things was compelled to control that, and he was controlled in that by the periodic demands of money from the Government, as well as its current and constant receipt. That demand will continue, that ebb and flow will continue, and it will regulate itself with $400,000,000 just as it did with $356,000,000; but until this extraordinary volume of $18,000,000 additional shall be issued, I ask what use does the Senator from Missouri propose shall be made of it? I assume it to be an unhappy fact that it is authorized, but, being authorized, how will he conduct it?

Mr. SCHURZ. In answer to the question put to me by the Senator from Delaware, I would say that I did not want to issue the $18,000,000 at all; but if they are to be issued, then I must say that I wish they would be issued in such a way as to produce, if possible, the effects desired by the expansionists, as far as their desire has been expressed. I do not want them to be thrown right into the caldron of speculation in Wall street, as they will be, if United States bonds are purchased with them. Neither do I desire that by any act of the national Legislature the Government should be so crippled in its resources as not to have current revenue enough to defray the running expenses of the Government. I therefore think that, as a certain object was to be accomplished by the issue of these $18,000,000, the gentlemen who desire that increase are bound to give us a method of issue by which the objects which they contemplate shall be effected. I am free to say to the Senator from Delaware, that rather than that the eighteen millions shall go where they will only do mischief, I desire that they be retained in the Treasury, and not go out at all.

Mr. MORTON. The amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont is obviously intended to defeat the action of the Senate yesterday. We have heard of the case of the man who was in favor of the Maine liquor law but opposed to its execution; and this is precisely in that line. The Senator would like to fix it so that the action of the Senate yesterday shall be defeated. Now, we are told that if the greenbacks are put out they will all go to Wall street and they will stay there; and then when we want a currency issued in the West from national banks, we are told that currency will go wherever it is demanded, and it does not make any difference where it is put out. The argument is one way at one time and another way at another time. If it is paid out in Wall street, it will certainly stay there; but if it is paid out in the West, it will not stay there because it will go where it is wanted! Then we are told that if new banks are started, that will engorge Wall street; more money must be sent to Wall street than will be reissued; and so, whatever way you take it, Wall street gets it all!

Not one of these propositions is true. It is simply the way "how not to do it." There must be no increase of the legal-tenders; there must be no increase of national-bank currency; and to defeat all these propositions gentlemen are content to argue in a circle: at one time to argue that money paid out in Wall street will stay there, at another time that money when paid out will not stay where it is paid out, but will go where it is demanded. I hope both these propositions will be voted down.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, is it not a little singular here when we place $18,000,000 of money in the Treasury in addition to what is there now, or has been, that Senators are unwilling to say what is to be done with it? The only purpose of the amendment brought in here, and it was a purpose stated in entire good faith, was to ascertain and fix a limit as to what the Secretary should do with it. Does the Senator from Indiana propose that the Secretary of the Treasury shall go out and increase the public debt by paying a premium on bonds in the purchase of them at 20 per cent. advance with the eighteen millions that it is proposed here shall be the maximum limit of legal-tenders? That was the object that the amendment proposed by me was intended to defeat; and there was another purpose in it. It was to make it indispensable on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury that whatever bonds were purchased should be purchased with gold. There is another use to which the Secretary of the Treasury, of course, can devote these $18,000,000. I desire that the Senator from Indiana and those who co-operate with him in this great measure of relief, as they call it, to the country, shall be made to distinctly avow their purpose. If it is their purpose that this money is to be expended for the ordinary expenses of the Government, that we are to print greenbacks to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government, let them say so.

But, Mr. President, it seems to be distasteful to the majority here that any Senator who happened to vote against the first proposition that has been adopted by the majority shall be allowed to propose any amendment; and for the sake of seeing what kind of a bill the majority here can perfect of themselves, at least for the present, I will withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. That is an important amendment, and I think it should be adopted. I hope the Senator from Vermont will not withdraw it unless he intends to renew it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It will be renewed hereafter.

Mr. LOGAN. I wanted to say before the Senator withdrew it, and I have a right to say now, that his insinuation about the majority of this Senate is not necessary at all in a body like this. He withdraws this amendment to see what kind of a bill the majority will perfect. Does the Senator from Vermont think there is no intelligence here except what is contained in his own brain; that nobody can perfect a bill but himself? What do these Senators mean by these insinuations against the majority of the Senate as though they were a parcel of children? If you do not think they can perfect a bill, let them try it and see. Yesterday the Senators were very sensitive because the Senator from Iowa had the words "for circulation" in his amendment. He was appealed to to strike them out. He did strike them out to accommodate certain Senators; and now this morning they come forward and say they want to know what his amendment means. It only shows a determination on the part of certain gentlemen here to thwart the opinions of the majority, if they have it in their power. The tenacity with which they are acting in this matter shows a determination to disobey the will of the people of the land as well as to disregard the majority of the Senate.

Now, sir, I do not claim any extraordinary powers or any very great degree of intelligence for myself; but I do say that when Senators insinuate that no one can arrange a bill, or draft a bill, or perfect a bill or a section except themselves, it is arrogating to themselves an amount of intelligence and an amount of knowledge that they themselves alone arrogate to themselves, and that nobody attributes to them but themselves.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.]

Mr. SCHURZ. I do not know whether I have exceeded my limit; but I rise to say something in reply to the remarks which have just fallen from the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont being withdrawn, the debate is now on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SCHURZ. Then I am entitled to speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For ten minutes.

Mr. SCHURZ. I desire to give the Senator from Illinois to understand that the language which he has just been using toward what he calls the minority of this body, is very far from being polite.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. SCHURZ. Permit me. I am speaking now.

Mr. LOGAN. Go ahead.

Mr. SCHURZ. It seems to me that any member of this body, whether he belong to the minority or the majority, has an unquestionable right, in the exercise of his duty as a Senator of the United States and under his sense of responsibility, to offer any amendment to this bill that he pleases.

Mr. LOGAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SCHURZ. It seems to me, also, that there is not the least reason in the world, when a proposition is put forward as fairly and innocently as that offered by the Senator from Vermont, for subjecting that Senator to any suspicion of foul play. I am not speaking here for myself, but I believe there is no Senator on this floor who enjoys such a high reputation for fairness, for character, for intelligence, and for uniform courtesy, as the Senator from Vermont, and I do not think it can be considered appropriate in the least when that gentleman uses his privilege as a Senator of the United States in offering an amendment, that he should be reproached with language which, in the first place, puts his motives in question, and, secondly, is addressed to him in a manner which I do not know whether I should quietly submit to if it were addressed to me.

Sir, we who are in the minority on this question have the right to offer amendments, and we shall exercise that right. I do not think there is the least occasion for being told that when we exercise that right we are factiously disobeying the will of the people, or the will of the majority of the Senate. The Senate express their will by voting upon the propositions submitted, and when they are voted down the minority quietly accept the result; but until that is done I think we are entitled to be treated with just as much respect, whether belonging to the minority, however small that minority may be, as any Senator belonging to the majority, however large that majority may be. Sir, I shall insist upon fair play; shall insist upon courteous debate. I may assure the Senator that the minority of this body will not permit itself to be bullied from any course which it may conscientiously take.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, sometimes, when we do not exactly understand what a Senator is replying to, we get ourselves into a furor without any occasion. If the Senator from Missouri had understood what I was replying to he would not have become so excited and so ferocious as to tell us that he does not know that he would submit to any such remarks. If the Senator will repeat the remarks of the Senator from Vermont, we shall see whether he will submit to the reply I made or not. I was replying to the remark of the Senator from Vermont, that he withdrew his amendment to see what kind of a bill this majority would get up, insinuating that they had not ability to get up one. That was what I was replying to; and I had a right to say what I did against such an insinuation. I was not bullying anybody. I have not attempted to bully anybody. I do not come into this Chamber to bully anybody, nor do I allow any man to bully me.

I said nothing discourteous to any Senator here. I was replying to the Senator from Vermont in reference to his insinuation with regard to the majority on this section; I did not say the majority on the whole bill, for I do not know anything about that; but I was speaking of this section that was amended yesterday by the amendment adopted by the Senate. I said in reference to that, that the majority would take the responsibility of perfecting that amendment themselves and standing by what they did, and that they have intelligence enough to do it, and I do not like any such insinuation. I said that, and I repeat it.

I am perfectly willing to be lectured, when it is necessary, about courtesy in this Chamber. The Senator from Vermont is a gentleman for whom I have as high an appreciation, perhaps, as the Senator from Missouri has, and as high regard for his ability; and I presume when the Senator from Vermont is offended at anything I say or that any other Senator says of him he is perfectly able to defend himself without the Senator from Missouri so promptly coming to the rescue, on account of the other Senator perhaps not being able to defend himself. Why does the Senator from Missouri think that he is the champion of every man in this Senate; that he must protect every man in this Senate; that he must arraign other men in this Senate for their language? If I use disrespectful and discourteous language, no man is more ready to take it back than I am when my attention is called to it; but, sir, I am not to have a censorship exercised over me by any Senator when I do not use any language toward him that is discourteous. The Senator from Missouri was not in my mind at all when I was speaking about this thing; I did not even think of him. I was thinking of the Senator from Vermont. I was not reflecting upon the Senator from Missouri. He never entered my mind until he walked forward here, and then I saw him. Then he was in my mind, not before.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, we all understand the manner of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] He can no more help his manner than I can mine. The Senator from Illinois did, in the first opening remarks he made this morning, say some things that I thought were rather pinching, but at the same time I did not see fit to take any notice of them. And so far as his inference is that I made any insinuation as to the majority, he is entirely mistaken. I only proposed to withdraw my amendment in order to give the majority an opportunity to perfect their bill. I might have chosen some other word and said, "see what sort of a bill," or "what bill." But there was no insinuation in my remarks. The Senator from Illinois is altogether too "sudden and quick in quarrel." I have no difficulty with him, nor with the majority.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I certainly have not quarreled with the Senator, nor have I had any disposition to quarrel with him. I said what I had a right to say when he insinuated that he withdrew the amendment for the purpose of seeing what kind of a bill the majority would make. I responded to that in just such language as was natural for any Senator to respond in.

As to his insinuation about the Senators knowing my manner, my manner is my own, and it is not the subject of criticism, either; or at least it ought not to be. My manner is my own. It may be gentle or it may not be. It may sometimes be belligerent or it may sometimes not be. It may sometimes be mild and it may sometimes be otherwise. We all have our own peculiarities. It is not a crime, that I know of. My manner is earnest; I mean what I say; and if every other Senator meant always what he said, perhaps we should understand one another better.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SCHURZ. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. THURMAN. I will give way in a minute. I only want to make an inquiry for my own information. I think it would conduce to the harmonious proceedings of the Senate if we were to come to an understanding at once as to what is meant by the words "majority" and "minority" in the consideration of this bill. It seems to be assumed by some Senators that because they were in a majority upon a single question, the question whether the volume of greenbacks should be $382,000,000 or $400,000,000, therefore they are in a majority upon every question that can arise in the consideration of this subject.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me right there? If this is in reply to what I said, I have only to remark that I stated that I did not know who was in the majority in reference to any other part of the bill, but that a majority had voted for the $400,000,000, and that was what the controversy was about, not in reference to any other provision of the bill. No one assumed any such thing; I certainly did not.

Mr. THURMAN. I am very glad to understand, then, that we are not told to keep our peace upon everything else.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Vermont spoke about "the majority."

Mr. THURMAN. I do not care who spoke about it, for I was not referring to any particular Senator. I want to know for my own information what is meant by "majorities" and "minorities" here.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It was first referred to by the Senator from Illinois, in his first speech.

Mr. THURMAN. Suppose there has been a majority on one single question, what does it decide? What has that majority decided? That there shall be $400,000,000 of greenbacks. Has it decided anything else than that? It has decided that the volume of greenbacks shall be $400,000,000. I repeat, has it decided anything else? Has it decided what shall be done with them? Has it decided whether or not the use of them for any particular purpose shall be prohibited or shall not be prohibited? In other words, has it attempted to define in any way, by simply fixing their volume at $400,000,000, what shall be the entire function of those greenbacks? I have yet to learn that; I do not understand it to be so, and therefore it seems to me that it will be quite sufficient to talk about "majorities" and "minorities" when each question has been decided. In other words, here are propositions as various as nature itself, and almost as multitudinous as the productions of nature. I imagine that each one of them will have to be decided upon its own intrinsic merits, according to the opinions of Senators; and that until each is decided, no one can predicate of it that there is a particular majority on this floor.

Mr. SCHURZ. I want to say only one word in reply to the Senator from Illinois, and that is that I entirely agree with my friend from Vermont, who again entirely agrees with the Senator from Illinois himself, that the manner of that Senator is his own, and I hope it will remain so.

To this I have only to add that I think it somewhat superfluous that when we on our side offer amendments to this bill, or when we say we are curious to see what kind of a bill the majority will make—and I confess to some curiosity myself—we therefore cast a reflection upon the intelligence of the majority, for I can assure the Senator from Illinois that for the intelligence of the majority I entertain the profoundest respect.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Let the question before the Senate be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment proposed by Mr. MERRIMON is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and to insert in lieu of the matter stricken out:

That the maximum limit of United States notes for circulation is hereby fixed at $400,000,000, at which sum it shall remain.

SEC. 2. That forty-six millions in notes for circulation, in addition to such circulation now allowed by law, shall be issued to national banking associations now organized and which may be organized hereafter; and such increased circulation shall be distributed among the several States as provided in section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870.

It is proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] to amend that amendment by adding thereto the following:

SEC. 3. That so much of the twenty-seventh section of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, and of the several acts supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof; and such of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870; and so much or such parts of any other act or acts of Congress as limit, or as may be construed to limit or restrict, the entire amount of notes for circulation to be issued under the said act of June 3, 1864, and the several supplements thereto, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that hereafter all associations organized, or that may be organized, for carrying on the business of banking, under the provisions of said act, shall be free to establish and organize national banks with circulation, at any place within the several States and Territories of the United States, upon the terms and conditions and subject to all the limitations and restrictions now provided by law, except the limitation upon the entire amount of circulation, which is hereby repealed.

SEC. 4. That each national banking association now organized or hereafter to be organized shall keep and maintain, as a part of its reserve required by law, one-half part of the coin received by it as interest on bonds of the United States deposited as security for circulating notes or Government deposits; and that hereafter only one-half of the reserve now prescribed by law for national banking associations shall consist of balances due to an association available for the redemption of its circulating notes from associations in cities of redemption, and upon which balances no interest shall be paid.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only point to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate in this matter, for I do not intend to trouble the Senate with debate about this question or to defeat the will of the body, is that the amendment of the Senator from Illinois presents the simple question, in my judgment, whether the Senate prefer free banking without limitation or restriction or any plan of redemption, to the free banking proposed by the Committee on Finance in the third section of the original bill. The pending amendment brings up for consideration the simple choice between an enlargement in the way proposed by the Committee on Finance of the amount of circulating notes to be issued by the national banks, and free banking without any limit or restraint; and here I can state in a few words the reasons which influenced the Committee on Finance, I think unanimously, to prefer the mode reported.

In the first place, if free banking is allowed, the tendency will be to concentrate not only the new banks but the old banks in the Eastern States, where, on account of the facilities for redemption, it is easier and more profitable to conduct a bank. If capitalists are left to choose the place of locating a national bank, they surely will go, first, to a State where the taxation is least; and second, where the mode of redemption is easiest; and third, where the deposits are the most, where the natural tendency of the current of deposits leads; and that has led to the concentration of the great body of the banking capital of the country within a few hundred miles of New York city.

In my judgment, if you adopt free banking without any provision for its distribution, banks will go from the West to the East, even those that are now in existence. The remarkable phenomenon was presented at this session of a bank organized in Iowa, where they have but little capital, making an application to Congress to be allowed to transfer itself bodily to Ohio, where we have nearly our proportion. We are opposed to this system of concentrating the banking circulation of this country in the great commercial cities, because it would tend to continue and perpetuate the local discontent and dissatisfaction caused by the present distribution of bank circulation. Therefore it was that we preferred, while increasing the bank circulation, to make some other rule, which would secure a fair distribution of that circulation as well as an increase of its amount. The only point we had any hesitation about was, what should be the standard of that increase. On the whole, the committee thought the State of New York was the best standard. Why? Because New York has now 5 per cent. more than the share allotted to her by the Comptroller of the Currency, and this plan of ours would give to every State an opportunity to come up to the standard of New York, which would give them all 5 per cent. more than they would be entitled to under existing laws, even if they were authorized to organize up to the limit.

The only complaint I have heard against that is, first, that it does not adopt the theory of free banking; but I have given you the objection to the theory of free banking; and another objection made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] is that this would not give to Indiana enough to satisfy their local demand. It will give to Indiana a million and a quarter, to Ohio about three millions, and to all the States West and South more than they can possibly organize within many years to come. But if the Senate are dissatisfied with the standard that we have proposed, let them take the State of Pennsylvania, which would increase still more the amount allotted to the Western and Southern States, so as to give them 10 per cent. more than the amount allowed by the apportionment fixed by law at present.

Mr. LOGAN. Why not take Massachusetts?

Mr. SHERMAN. Because Massachusetts is far beyond the limit. To give to those States the standard of Massachusetts would allow an increase largely to the State of New York, and would practically lead to the very objection of concentrating the great body of the banking circulation in the Eastern States. The reasoning may not be good, but it led us to the conclusion that it was wiser to enlarge the limit in this way, to make practically free banking, without leading to further controversy about the distribution of bank circulation; and I now record the prediction that if Congress shall adopt the system of free banking without redemption, without something that will restrain the issue of bank-notes, the tendency will be to concentrate within one hundred miles of New York the great body of the bank circulation, and then you will have wide-spread discontent throughout the South and West, where the political power of this country lies, and it will endanger and may lead to the overthrow of your whole system. It is necessary in any measure you adopt to see that there is a distribution of these local banks; otherwise banks will go first where the taxes are lowest, next where the deposits are greatest, and third where redemption is easiest.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, this proceeding is all so clear and so plain, and we are assured so often that those who conduct it understand it so well, that I feel that no one deserves an explanation who fails to discover the meaning of what is going on. Nevertheless, I am compelled to admit that I am puzzled a little at this moment to find out the understanding of those by whom these two amendments are presented. One Senator offers an amendment consisting of two sections, that being in the nature of a substitute for the committee's bill. Another Senator, without waiting for a vote upon that, and moving to strike out nothing, moves to add two additional sections. One effect of this is to cut off all amendments, to preclude every other Senator from offering any amendment whatever, because an amendment, if offered, would be in the third degree, and therefore would be out of order. Of course, if I were at liberty to suppose that that was the motive of this, I could understand the object; but as I am not at liberty to suppose that that was the purpose of any of the Senators who are acting separately or together, I must look for an explanation in the matter offered, which it is proposed we shall adopt, that it may stand all together. Well, let us see what we should then have.

The first section is:

That the maximum limit of United States notes for circulation is hereby fixed at $400,000,000, at which sum it shall remain.

Whether that means that $400,000,000 is to be kept out, hit or miss, whether that is the thing that is thus to remain, or something else, is not the question which I rose to put to the Senate.

The next section provides that $46,000,000 in notes for circulation shall be added to the national-bank note circulation of the country, assuming that I am able to read what appears here.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the Senator from New York will permit me, I desire to correct him in relation to the question of order. This amendment to which he has referred was offered in the nature of a substitute. It leaves the original bill to be perfected in any manner that may be proposed.

Mr. CONKLING. But if my honorable friend had attended to my remark he would not have supposed that that was a correction of it. I am quite as well aware as he can be—that is one of the few things I do know—that it is in order to perfect the text before you strike it out. I am speaking of these two amendments; and when my honorable friend from Vermont finds a way now to offer an amendment to either of them, he will show himself the greatest parliamentarian that ever was fettered by Jefferson's Manual. I undertake to say that there is no mode of doing it; and I say again that if I could suppose the Senators intended to prevent my friend from Vermont from offering an amendment, I could see the object of that to which I am now endeavoring to call attention. It is this: Section 2 of the proposed substitute provides that $46,000,000 in bank-notes shall be added to the bank-note circulation, and then provides the means and the where it shall be distributed.

Now I come to the amendment to the amendment, which, striking out nothing, provides that the addition of bank-note circulation shall be absolutely without limit, except so far as the law of supply and demand shall establish limits; and this is all to stand in one statute together. What is it to mean when it is all adopted? If it were a will, I should appeal to the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to recite to me the canons of construction which assign to after-coming clauses their influence upon those which precede. It is a statute, a part of an enactment to be struck with the same die and imprint of legislation on the same day; and it provides in one section that $46,000,000 shall be added to the national-bank circulation, and provides in the next-coming section that there shall be all the addition that anybody asks for. Whoever has strength or inclination to rise and move for judgment is to have it as if on a forthcoming bond, to the amount of all the circulation for which he is able to deposit bonds. And that result is effected, as I understand, by repealing so much of a great number of sections recited, and the several supplements thereto, "as limit, or as may be construed to limit or restrict, the entire amount of notes for circulation to be issued under the said act of June 3, 1864, and the several supplements thereto, be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

If those two sections consist with each other, and if that is the meaning of the Senators who have been called or miscalled the majority, and who seem to have a common understanding on this, at least an intelligent understanding, I shall be glad to know it. If, on the contrary, there is any mistake about this, and we are not asked to vote for these two sections apparently irreconcilable with each other, I should be very glad if some Senator would have the benevolence to explain it to those who, like me, do not understand it.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I rise to ask whether the Senator from Illinois will not accept in lieu of the first section of his amendment, the third section of the bill offered by the Committee on Finance? For one who has acted with the majority hitherto, I am fully agreed with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] if I understood his remarks, that this section will better subserve the purpose of the South and West than the one offered by the Senator from Illinois. If I am mistaken in that, I hope I shall be put right.

My purpose has been, as his has, and the purpose of all those who have acted together in this matter, to see that the currency shall be distributed to those States which really need it. I apprehend if we pass an absolutely free banking law, banks will be organized in those States where money is now most abundant. If it is limited to those States where the currency is needed, as the section reported by the Finance Committee limits it, it will force the money-lenders in the States where it is now abundant, if banks are organized at all, to organize them in those States where money is needed.

I propound this question more to get information for my own mind by which to be guided, than to raise any issue on this point. I agree with the Senator from New York that if we are to have free banking, the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is utterly useless and meaningless. Why provide for forty-six millions and then provide any number of millions? I suggest to both these gentlemen that, for the third section of the bill as reported by the committee accomplishes the entire purpose for which we have been contending. I trust that these gentlemen will accept that amendment. I am satisfied that the third section of the committee's bill can be carried by a very considerable majority in the Senate. I apprehend that the other amendments will not accomplish our purpose if we adopt them. If I am wrong I desire to be corrected and enlightened on that subject.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the Senator from Illinois intended that his amendment should take the place of that portion of the substitute offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. LOGAN. I will answer that.

Mr. MORTON. I so understood at the time. It may be said that he offered it in addition, but it was intended to take the place of it.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state right now, if the Senator will allow me, that just at the adjournment yesterday I offered the amendment. I said nothing about it, but my purpose is to offer this amendment, when the proper time comes, to the first section of the bill of the Senator from North Carolina; after the clause as to four hundred million greenbacks, then to add this amendment so as to provide for four hundred millions of United States currency and also for free banking, striking out the other sections of the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. GORDON. That relieves one objection, if the Senator from Indiana will allow me, but not the one to which I called the attention of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. I will look at that.

Mr. MORTON. The argument of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that free banking will result in the concentration of national banks within one hundred miles of New York I regard as erroneous, as contrary to the argument arising from the whole situation. In the first place, national banks are not profitable without deposits. The profit on the currency, as shown by the Comptroller, is less than 2 per cent. Therefore no national bank can be maintained profitably West or East, unless it shall be so managed and so located as to attract deposits. They have enough banks now in Boston and New York and every other place in the East to absorb all the deposits that are offered. They do not require a new bank for that purpose. But there are hundreds and hundreds of towns in the West where there is no bank at all, and where a bank once established will attract a line of deposits that will make that bank profitable; and this is the argument I have been trying to present during this whole discussion. I want to meet these local demands, for I say that no national bank can be maintained unless it can be maintained profitably, and it cannot be unless it can attract a liberal line of deposits; and to establish a bank in a town where there are already banks enough to absorb all the deposits, is without object. Therefore this danger of the East absorbing all the national banks is wholly without reason. If there are not enough banks in Boston for the deposits there, then give them more, I say; but if there are enough, then nobody in Boston can afford to start and maintain another national bank. I want the West and the South, and even Pennsylvania and New York, for I believe they, too, want more. I have no doubt that New York this day, in the western and middle parts, is in need of additional national-bank facilities. I have no doubt in regard to Pennsylvania. I know how it is in regard to my State. Now, put in the limitation of New York, as it is in the third section of the bill reported by the Senator from Ohio, and he says it gives Indiana a million and a quarter additional. Why, sir, that does not meet the demands of Indiana to-day.

There is no danger, in my judgment, in the establishment of free banking, because national banks are costly; they require actual capital. It is not the old system of wild-cat banking, where men could bank without capital, and where there was danger in free banking, and where there had to be safeguards. National banking is costly; it requires actual cash to begin it; and no man of sense can afford to establish a national bank in a town where there is not a demand for it, and he will not do it. There must be a demand for it in the way of local business. He cannot afford to put two banks in a town where one bank will do the business properly of that town and that neighborhood.

Therefore, Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, while I am prepared to take the very best that I can get in this whole business, I believe, on a full and fair consideration of everything, that free banking, as it is called, is the safest and the best for the whole country. If the wants of New England are such that she actually needs more banks, I say give them to her, although she has now got far more than her share of the existing national banking capital.

The whole argument on the other side has ignored the actual condition of the country from first to last. That is the trouble with our friends. They insist on considering things just as they were in 1865. They refuse to recognize what has taken place since; they refuse to recognize the actual condition of this country. All that I have asked from first to last is that the present condition of this country in wealth, in population, in growth and development, shall be considered.

Why, sir, the present plethora of currency in New York, which is thrown in our faces at every moment, only proves the existence of disease, not that there is enough money; and when we were told in a speech the other night at the Cooper Institute that $14,000,000 could be borrowed for stock speculation, and that a respectable, responsible house could not get $25,000 for mercantile purposes for sixty days, what does that prove? It proves that there is a want of confidence; that while men will lend money upon call, upon the deposit of bonds and collateral security that may be called in to-morrow, they do not feel safe in lending it for sixty days; and yet we are told that proves that everything is lovely, there is plenty of currency, and business is in a first-rate condition! It proves just the reverse; it proves just what we have been saying. There is a want of legitimate demand for money, owing to the general prostration of business. A thousand legitimate demands that existed six months ago do not exist now, and will not, until Congress by its action shall restore confidence among the people of the United States.

The people generally demand an increase of currency in some form, a moderate increase; but we are told they cannot be trusted; if you give them any at all they gorge themselves, that they have no sense; if you trust them in the least they will go to extremities, they will become extravagant and run wild. What is money for? It is the instrument of business; and if business increases more money is required; if business diminishes, less money is required. There is no more sense in saying that there shall be a fixed volume of currency than there is in saying that a person shall have the same amount of food from childhood to manhood. The volume of currency ought to be regulated to suit the growth, increase, and demands of the country.

Mr. HOWE. I understand the Senator to say that money is demanded for business purposes; that the more money we have the more business we shall have?

Mr. MORTON. I think that is the case now; but I mean to say this: that money is the instrument of business, and as business increases money should increase to meet that business.

Mr. HOWE. Well, does the reverse hold true, that as money increases business increases?

Mr. MORTON. No, sir; not always; but as a general thing that is the case. That has been the case. Plenty of money, an abundance of money, does stimulate business; it does stimulate enterprises and growth; and that is the history of the world.

Mr. HOWE. Very well; then why not carry the Senator's reasoning out to its logical conclusion? Why stop at $18,000,000 increase?

Mr. MORTON. There is a reasonable limit to everything. While plenty of food is required to give a man strength, he may become a glutton and kill himself, and because plenty of food gives him strength and energy, would you argue in favor of starvation on the other hand?

Mr. HOWE. Not a bit of it. I have some little ways of determining when I have eaten enough. What is the Senator's plan of determining when the country has got money enough? I think a financier who has considered this subject as long as the Senator from Indiana could lay down some standard by which statesmen can determine when you have got enough. The statesmen we have here are divided on that question. What is the rule?

Mr. SCHURZ. Will the Senator from Indiana permit me to make a suggestion to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator asks what is the criterion by which we are to measure whether there is money enough. Now, I am in the habit of looking at the market reports——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana has occupied ten minutes.

Mr. SCHURZ. Then I will take the floor for myself.

I am in the habit of looking at the market reports. The Senator from Indiana said that, of course, New York was full of money, but that was not a sign of a general abundance of money, but rather of scarcity. I hold a Saint Louis paper of the 25th of March in my hand, which I have received just this moment, which speaks as follows:

> During the week ending with this evening; the local money market maintained that ease which has been noted concerning it during the past three months. There have been days when the discount market was active, but as a general thing it can again be reported that the supply of loanable funds under the light demand continues to accumulate.

It quotes from Cincinnati:

> Business in our local money market has been unusually dull nearly all the week, and the banks have gained so largely in means that the market is very easy at 8 to 9 per cent., and in some instances even lower figures are accepted.

Quoting from a Chicago market report:

> It is useless for any one to deny the fact that there is an unusual amount of loanable funds in the market which the owners are willing to lend at 8 per cent. if they can get satisfactory security.

So it seems that the abundance of money in the New York market is not a sign of the scarcity of money elsewhere.

Mr. MORTON. We have heard that two or three times in this debate.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina proposes to strike out all of the bill reported by the committee, and that would strike out any provision whatever for redemption of the United States notes, and that would strike out the only thing which could induce me to vote for a system of free banking. I shall vote for a system of free banking whenever there is incorporated with it anything which looks like a reasonable system of redemption, and I not only will vote for it, but I desire to see that kind of a system of free banking.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. We have on the statute-book now the amplest provision for free banking that any man can imagine, if they will only pay specie.

Mr. SCOTT. On a gold basis?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. I am aware of that.

But, Mr. President, I do not wish to take up time on that part of the case, for I have already adverted to it in other remarks that I have made. I desire it because I wish to see the bonds upon which these national banks would be based brought within the control of our own citizens, and I would be very glad to see the whole volume of the national indebtedness which is now held abroad brought back here for that purpose, if it can be brought with a provision for the redemption of our United States notes.

But, sir, I rose more for another purpose. I followed the Senator from New York in his criticism upon the second section of the proposed amendment as coupled with the amendment to that amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, and I do not see how the two are to stand together; but my attention having been called to the consistency of these two amendments with each other, I was prompted by curiosity to scan the amendment to the amendment, knowing full well that it has been the subject of great care, and not distrusting for one moment that which the Senator from Illinois seems disposed to think some members do distrust, his ability to prepare a section of this character, or to perfect a bill. I find that he first repeals the twenty-seventh section of the national-banking law, and then he proceeds, so that there shall be no difficulty about there being a repeal, and he repeals—

> So much or such parts of any other act or acts of Congress as limit, or as may be construed to limit or restrict, the entire amount of notes for circulation to be issued under the said act of June 3, 1864, and the several supplements thereto.

Turning to the section which is repealed, by reference I find it reads as follows:

> SEC. 27. And be it further enacted, That it shall be unlawful for any officer acting under the provisions of this act to countersign or deliver to any association, or to any other company or person, any circulating notes contemplated by this act, except as hereinbefore provided, and in accordance with the true intent and meaning of this act. And any officer who shall violate the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding double the amount so countersigned and delivered, and imprisonment not less than one year and not exceeding fifteen years, at the discretion of the court in which he shall be tried.

So that the effect of the amendment is to release the officers of national banks or the officers of the Treasury from the penalty imposed upon them for issuing these notes in violation of the law, and then to repeal all restrictions upon the issue of the notes.

Mr. CONKLING. And that is the first section named in the amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. That is the section named, the twenty-seventh section, which imposes a penalty upon any officer acting under the provisions of the act, countersigning and delivering these notes. First, the broad language repeals all restrictions upon issuing the notes, and then you repeal the section which imposes a penalty upon the officer of the Treasury who shall issue notes in violation of existing law.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Illinois only intends to repeal the restriction upon the amount.

Mr. SCOTT. That is in another section altogether; that is in the twenty-second section. I do not understand that this is the intention of the amendment, but that is what it accomplishes. It makes free banking. You may issue all the notes that anybody can come for, and then if any officer of the Treasury issues $2,000,000,000, although there are only $1,500,000,000 of bonds to base them upon, he is to be released from the penalty for issuing them. He cannot issue them unless the bonds are brought, but if they are issued in violation of the section, this amendment is intended to repeal the provision which imposes a penalty upon him. That is certainly free banking. That would certainly permit the issue of bank-notes in the manner suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] yesterday, to be distributed as public documents for the amusement of the children.

Now, sir, I do not wish to take up time in arguing the other features of the measure, but I do wish to call attention to what I think will show that the provision reported by the committee would certainly give opportunity for testing the operation of this free banking. Suppose you take the limit that Pennsylvania now has, which would give 10 per cent., or even if you take the limit which Massachusetts or Connecticut or any one of the New England States has; how long would it take before the additional circulation would be taken up? We passed an act in 1870 increasing this national-bank circulation $54,000,000, and it is only within the last few months that the limit has been reached. It has taken four years. During four years of prosperity $54,000,000 were applied for in the Southern and Western States. Now, with the limit of New York, the committee's bill will give about $110,000,000; and at that rate it would be at least four years more, even if the demands of the country for circulation are 50 per cent. more than they were during the past four years, before this limit would be taken up. If you adopt the limit of Pennsylvania, it would give eight years for the purpose of determining whether this free banking would operate and would in that time, as the Senator from Ohio has shown, be taking capital from the older States and perforce putting it in the Western States, instead of building up and thrusting upon public attention the monopoly in this business which would be obtained and enjoyed in the Eastern States.

Mr. MORTON. There is not so much danger of a rush, after all, is there?

Mr. SCOTT. I say there is not so much danger, after all, and therefore the section reported by the committee gives ample opportunity and verge enough for the experiment of this question of free banking; and so long as it is unaccompanied with redemption I wish to see some limit to it. Put the feature of redemption in it, and I will vote for free banking. I want it. I want to drop all the features of monopoly about the system, when accompanied by such provisions as will give it safety.

Now, sir, I have made this criticism on the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois; and taking it for granted that it has been carefully prepared and carefully scanned, and reading that section as it stands, has it not that effect? Does it not permit an unlimited issue of bank-notes and release the officer of the Treasury who would issue them in violation of the provisions of existing laws from the penalties of that misconduct?

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I have been somewhat surprised at the criticism of the Senator from Pennsylvania. It seems to me he is very late finding out this defect, if it be true. I offered this amendment, as I said awhile ago, just as the Senate adjourned last evening, as the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] some weeks ago, word for word, which we had up in the Senate and discussed and voted upon. I intended to say this morning when the question came up that this amendment was offered by me inasmuch as the Senator from Pennsylvania was absent on account of a death in his family, and that it was offered as the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] It is true that I added to this amendment a section that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] himself helped to prepare, or at least I presume he did, because it is a section cut out of the bill of the Finance Committee, with not a solitary word in it altered except "one-fourth" changed to "one-half."

Mr. SCOTT. That is not the section on which I commented.

Mr. LOGAN. I know that, but that is the second section of my amendment. The other is a section which has been discussed before the Senate. I have examined it, and I do not understand the criticism made by the Senator from Pennsylvania to be a good one. Of course, he thinks it is. Now let us read it and see:

That so much of the twenty-seventh section of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, and of the several acts supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof; and such of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870; and so much or such parts of any other act or acts of Congress as limit, or as may be construed to limit or restrict, the entire amount of notes for circulation to be issued under the said act of June 3, 1864, and the several supplements thereto, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

What is repealed? That portion which limits the circulation, and nothing else.

Mr. MORTON. It does not repeal the whole section at all.

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all; and I do not see how the Senator from Pennsylvania can fall into that kind of error. All of these acts are taken together, and then the conclusion is that so much of each of these acts and the acts supplementary thereto as limits the circulation is repealed, and nothing else.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator permit me a question at that point?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCOTT. Let me read the twenty-seventh section, and ask him what else there is in it limiting the circulation except the penalty upon the officer of the Treasury for unlawfully issuing it. I will read the whole section:

SEC. 27. And be it further enacted, That it shall be unlawful for any officer act, ing under the provisions of this act to countersign or deliver to any association, or to any other company or person, any circulating notes contemplated by this act except as hereinbefore provided, and in accordance with the true intent and meaning of this act. And any officer who shall violate the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding double the amount so countersigned and delivered, and imprisonment not less than one year and not exceeding fifteen years, at the discretion of the court in which he shall be tried.

Mr. MORTON. This amendment does not repeal anything in that section.

Mr. SCOTT. Then why is it repealed? Why refer to it by name? It is the very first section referred to as repealed.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon; all of the sections in reference to banking and currency are referred to, and all the supplementary acts are referred to, and then this repealing clause applies only to the limit on the circulation, and nothing else.

Mr. MORTON. It does not repeal anything in that section.

Mr. LOGAN. It does not repeal a thing in any section, except the limit on the circulation. It names all the acts so as to encompass them in one bill and then repeals the parts that may be in any of those acts that affect the circulation, and that is all there is in it. But if the criticism of the Senator from Pennsylvania was even correct, and he desired to perfect this proposition, it would be very easy for him to move to strike out that clause.

Mr. SCOTT. I call the attention of the Senator to it.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; we will examine it and see what it means.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It seems to me that the Senator from Illinois did not mean to repeal that act. It is too plain for us to argue about it.

Mr. LOGAN. It does not repeal that act.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator from Illinois certainly did not put in his amendment the repeal of an act which was not to be affected one way or the other by this law. That is clear. What the Senator from Illinois meant, I presume, and it may have been a mere clerical mistake, is the twenty-second section.

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator will permit me, I wished to call the attention of the Senator from Illinois to it that he might inform us as to that fact. I called attention to it in good faith. If it is the twenty-second section that is meant, then I can understand it; but if it is the twenty-seventh section then I wish to enter my solemn protest against repealing that section.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend from Illinois allow me to make an observation?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. I am no friend of this amendment of the Senator from Illinois, but I must say that it is not, in my judgment, justly subject to the criticism of the Senator from Pennsylvania; and that if this amendment be a proper one, it will be proper to retain it in these words which are supposed to be objectionable. The twenty-seventh section of the banking act makes it "unlawful for any officer acting under the provisions of this act to countersign or deliver"—leaving out a part of it—"any circulating notes contemplated by this act, except as hereinbefore provided, and in accordance with the true intent and meaning of this act;" and "hereinbefore," that is, in the twenty-second section, it is provided that "the entire amount of notes for circulation to be issued under this act shall not exceed $300,000,000." Then the twenty-seventh section makes it unlawful for any officer to countersign or deliver more than $300,000,000. The object of the Senator from Illinois is to remove that unlawfulness, so that it shall be lawful to countersign more than $300,000,000, and we already did it when we authorized the increase of $54,000,000.

Mr. CONKLING. May I be permitted to ask one question? If the twenty-second section is meant, I submit to the Senator by his own showing, would not the appropriate way be to amend the twenty-second section so that when this officer acts in accordance with that, he shall be able to do what this bill contemplates?

Mr. THURMAN. That would be the better way. If you should amend the twenty-second section, so as to say, "it shall read as follows," then perhaps the twenty-seventh section would refer to it in its new form.

Mr. MORTON. The reading of the section is all the argument that is necessary.

Mr. LOGAN. The twenty-seventh section, and all preceding sections and acts, and all supplementary acts being referred to, nothing can be plainer in my judgment than that this amendment is just exactly as it should be if the Senate intends to adopt a free banking bill. I am as ready to submit when I am mistaken as anybody else, but I am not mistaken about this thing. I know the amendment is exactly right. I am satisfied of it. It repeals nothing in the world but the limit on the circulation and all things that tend to that limit in this law, and that is all it does. It is no matter whether it refers to the twenty-second or the twenty-seventh section. It names the twenty-seventh section, and refers to all preceding sections and laws, and all supplementary laws, and repeals that limit in them, and nothing else. That is the construction of the section, and it can have no other construction.

I do not suppose there is a Senator here who can frame a proposition that disagrees with the views of certain other Senators that will be acceptable. That is pretty certain. All sorts of objections will be found to it. But the Senator from Pennsylvania is mistaken, in my judgment, as to his construction of this proposition. I admit that he is a good lawyer, but I am satisfied from examination that his construction is incorrect. The construction of this section of my amendment is to repeal the limitation on that particular thing, and nothing else. That is all it applies to except that whatever may be in connection with it in any way whatever, either of officers or anything else that refers to that limitation, is repealed to that extent and no further. That is the meaning of it, and I do not propose to change it, because it is exactly right the way it is. It repeals everything that restricts the circulation, and repeals nothing else. That is all the effect that the section has.

While I am up, I will say a word in answer to some of the objections that have been made by Senators here. As a matter of course, every kind of objection will be made to free banking. We are told that if we establish free banking the country is going to be flooded, the world is going to be deluged with paper money, and all the objections possible to be made will be made, in order to do what? In order to carry out a certain theory, and that is, the contraction of the currency. Now let us see what the volume will be. I think there is no man here who will stand up before the Senate and the country and say that the monopoly feature in the national banking law is correct. I do not believe there is a Senator here who will do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, in the chair.) The ten minutes of the Senator from Illinois have expired.

Mr. MORTON. I move to strike out the second section of the original bill. The Senator from Illinois can continue his remarks on that motion.

Mr. LOGAN. On that amendment I ask leave to continue my explanation.

I was saying that I did not believe there was a Senator in the Chamber who would stand up before the country and say that he was in favor of the restrictive monopoly feature of the national banking law. If we are not in favor of that feature, if we are not in favor of restricting the right to bank in any State or Territory in this Union, what then is the converse of the proposition? It is the repeal of that restriction. What effect does the repeal of that restriction produce? It is to give any banking association that will put up the bonds in the Treasury of the United States the right to such circulation as the law authorizes, after those bonds have been placed there as the basis for circulation. That is all that this proposition does, nd it is all it proposes to do, to give the same right to one set of individuals in one community that another set of individuals in another community enjoy under the present law as it exists.

Then, in reference to the amount, it is not possible that the country will be flooded with paper money. It is restricted by the volume of United States notes; it is restricted by the business of the country; it is restricted the same as anything can be by the business operations of the country, and that is restriction enough, in my judgment, so far as the circulating medium is concerned.

But the Committee on Finance say they are in favor of free banking. What sort of free banking? Free banking in one State and not free banking in two; free banking in three States, but not in five. That is not free banking. That is not taking off the restrictive feature in this banking law at all, but it is merely doling out driblets in certain States to quiet them for awhile, and that is all there is in it, and that is the meaning of it. Inasmuch as the West and South demand that they shall be placed on an equality with New England and other States, the Committee on Finance now propose to give them a crumb, so that they may be satisfied for awhile. That is all it means.

But the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] says he is for free banking with some mode of redemption. Let us see whether he is in earnest or not. I added a section to this amendment providing for a reserve of gold for the redemption of the national-bank notes to the amount of one-half of the interest accruing on the bonds on deposit in the Treasury of the United States. Why do I do that? In order that when the Treasury of the United States is accumulating gold for the redemption of United States notes the national banks may be accumulating gold at the same time, so that when the Treasury of the United States is ready to say "We will redeem our notes" the national banks will be ready to say the same thing. That is the nature of this proposition. You want the Government of the United States to redeem its notes, but do you not know that the very moment the Government of the United States proposes to redeem all the United States notes, every national bank in the United States must be prepared to redeem its notes at the same time or go into liquidation? This amendment, then, as presented, will place the Government of the United States and the national banks on an equal footing so far as the preparation for a redemption of their outstanding notes is concerned. Hence it starts out with an equality—an equality of rights in the business transaction of banking to all States and all associations, and an equality so far as preparation for the redemption of notes is concerned with the Government of the United States. In that I believe it is just.

Now, if these Senators are in favor, as they say they are, of a preparation for specie payments, here it is just as they provided in their bill, except that instead of saying, as the Committee on Finance did, that one-fourth of the gold received for interest from bonds should be held as a reserve, this amendment increases it to one-half—makes it a larger amount. That is all the difference. If these Senators are really in favor of free banking, if they desire it, this amendment provides for it, and in my judgment provides for it in the best mode we can provide for a system of that kind.

I have but one more remark to make, as the time is very short, in answer to a suggestion made by several Senators. The Senator from Ohio now absent from his seat, [Mr. THURMAN,] the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] and several others, have said "You talk about majorities." There has not been a word said about a majority on any proposition here except the one that was voted upon yesterday evening. I know nothing as to how the Senate stands on this proposition, except the position of a few gentlemen with whom I have conversed. I do not present this amendment because I think there is a majority for it. I fear there is not. I present it because I think it is fair, just, right and equitable, and the very thing we ought to do to relieve the country as it stands to-day.

I notice that some Senators have very suddenly become greatly alarmed at the idea of free banking. Why? Do they suppose that banking will go on in the country to such an extent that the country will be ruined, while the Government stands behind the bank-notes with its gold-bearing bonds for their redemption in the hands of the people? I should like to inquire what ruin can fall upon the people when redemption is secured? There is not a Senator in this Chamber to-day but says he is for free banking, provided you will give gold redemption. What is the difference between a gold redemption and a secured redemption? If it is secured by gold-bearing bonds that will produce the gold, I should like to know the difference. These Senators are for free banking when we have the gold, but they know we have not the gold, and they know we are not going to have it very soon. Hence they are for free banking. How? Merely to satisfy the people that they are for it provided it can be done, but they are against it because they think it cannot be done. Sir, free banking can be carried on just as well as our present limited banking, because it is upon the same basis, with the very same redemption, and with the same privileges and none other that are now possessed by banks under the national banking act. If redemption is secured with the amount of banks we have in the United States at the present time, would not that redemption be equally secure if we had twice the number of banks? If the bond of the Government is good security to the bill-holder for one bank, is it not good for two banks? This idea that you will give free banking if we have gold to bank on is, in my judgment, without any foundation whatever, as long as we have good securities.

Let us see. Suppose you have gold banking; does every Senator here not know that we never had gold banking in this country except on the basis of about one dollar in gold to three in paper? But here, under this act, we have not only a dollar of gold-bearing bonds for a dollar of bank-notes, but we have one hundred cents of a gold-bearing bond for the redemption of ninety cents of your circulation, when your gold banks that you have spoken of had but one dollar of gold to three of paper for their redemption. It makes it a more secure and better plan, a better system, than any we have ever had in this country, and gives more security to the bill-holder throughout the whole country.

I offered this, as I said, because the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] was absent yesterday evening. It was his amendment. I claim no credit for it whatever, whether it is passed or defeated. He was absent, and he telegraphed me that he could not be here. He said nothing about this amendment, however, and I offered it because he was absent, inasmuch as he had offered it before, and I knew he would desire to do it if he was here. I offered it in good faith for him, and I shall stand by it and vote for it, because I think it is right.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I want to make a single suggestion in regard to section 4. It provides that the banks shall retain one-half of the coin which they receive for interest due on their bonds. The question with me is, what will be the effect of holding or hoarding the coin? If it has the same effect on gold which the hoarding or withdrawing from the market of other productions has, it will be to diminish the quantity and increase the price of the balance. So, if you lock up by this bill any considerable quantity of coin in the banks, I submit whether it will not increase the price of the balance, which as a matter of course will become, as it has already become, an article of merchandise, and whether he who buys coin, whether to pay duties on imports or interest on the public debt, will not pay more for it in consequence of carrying out the provision of this section.

Mr. SCHURZ. There is one thing to be said in addition to what the Senator from Connecticut has just remarked. I think it is a very important question whether we should by law permit anything to be part of the reserve of a bank, to be used in the redemption of the notes of that bank, but that kind of money in which the redemption is made. So in this case I think it very doubtful whether we should permit gold to form part of the reserve of a national bank while the redemption of the notes of that bank is made in greenbacks. When banks are paying gold for their notes, I ask, would a good banking law permit real estate or wheat to form part of the reserve of the bank? I think not.

Mr. LOGAN. I have but this to say in answer to that: It is very strange how changeable arguments are. For months we have heard the argument here that gentlemen were in favor of gold redemption on all hands. I have heard the argument on this floor in favor of the Treasury of the United States getting gold and hoarding it there in order to prepare for redemption now. Now we hear the argument that if the banks hold part of their reserve in gold, it will be hoarding gold and putting it out of the market. It only looks to me as though there is nothing that is satisfactory. One argument is good one day in one line, and it is just as good the next in another line. If it is good to hoard gold in the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of preparing for redemption, I want you to tell me why it is not good to hoard gold in a bank for the purpose of preparing for its redemption?

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator from Illinois set out with the remark that it was remarkable how changeable arguments are, and then he went on to—I would not say insinuate——

Mr. LOGAN. I did not say anything about your argument.

Mr. SCHURZ. Then I suppose it referred to somebody else.

Mr. LOGAN. I referred to the Senator from New Jersey, who made a suggestion in reference to getting gold in the Treasury preparatory to the redemption of the United States notes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. LOGAN. And I said that arguments were made one way on one side and another way on another line.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, Mr. President, I did make that suggestion, and what I thought was as near as I could come to an argument in support of it; and I shall, before this bill is perfected, renew that same suggestion, and, with such time as I have, advocate it; for I believe the only possible way that we can ever come to a resumption of specie is to have specie, and I believe it is perfectly feasible for us to have it. As to that portion of the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, it meets my hearty approbation; and the way that I would remedy the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Connecticut is that I would make an amendment to his amendment making it lawful for the banks on good security to loan out that gold.

Mr. LOGAN. As a gold loan?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes.

Mr. SCHURZ. When the Senator from New Jersey interrupted me I merely desired to state that if the Senator from Illinois referred to the changing of arguments, he certainly did not refer to any of mine, for I had not made any such change.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from Missouri must not think I am referring to him every time I make an argument on the floor, for he did not enter my mind at all. I was not thinking of him or his argument.

Mr. SCHURZ. I do not aspire to such honor.

Mr. BOGY. Every Senator on this floor, I think, has spoken but myself, and it is time I should say something. I will detain the Senate but a moment. I rise to say a word because I wish to present to the mind of the Senate again a little plan of my own that I suggested at the beginning of the discussion of this subject as early as the month of January. It is to take this entire subject out of Congress and give it back to the States, where this subject properly belongs; and this very discussion shows that it does not belong here. As I am limited to ten minutes I will not detain the Senate in making much of a speech, but will read from the report of Mr. Ellis, the superintendent of the banking department of the State of New York, advancing very ably the same ideas:

Banking should be free—

Says this report.

What is to be the future banking system, and the paper currency of the country? The reasons why the Government should not control and manage the issues of the currency capriciously and arbitrarily, are impregnably strong. The power is so great, and its abuse is so easy, as to furnish temptations which it would be more than human always to resist successfully. The perversion of such power is so ruinous and wide-spread in its ultimate effects, and the remedy for them is so difficult to apply, that a free people should always refuse to permit their rulers to exercise such plenary powers. History is full of warning upon this point; fresh examples may be found in our own.

Under the prohibitory tax of Congress, State circulation can no longer be issued, and so long as the tax remains we must be content with the national currency unequally distributed, and adapted to the varying wants of trade, only by the limitations of restrictive law, without the inherent powers of expansion and contraction by the demands and necessities of business. While it is generally conceded that we must have a paper currency, it is at least debatable whether the present one is the best for the country.

The national banking system is radically defective in some essential features. Proof of this is seen in the numerous propositions for amendment and in the substitutes presented to Congress; and in the frequent solicitation for important changes by the large commercial associations of the country, which represent the trained capacity and the practical knowledge of the men who are foremost in our grand domestic business enterprises and industries, and who direct our commerce and traffic with other nations. The material modification of the national banking law is demanded, with the repeal of those restrictions which prevent the formation of new banks, and limit the powers of State banks by onerous discriminations against them. Banking should be free. Such a system only is consonant with the spirit of our institutions and the temper of our people.

The people evidently desire the management of their own affairs in trade and finance, with as little intervention by the Federal Government as possible, leaving to Congress the exercise of its constitutional prerogatives, and giving to the several States the reserved powers inherent in them. The regulation of the currency is a proper function of the national Government. Banking belongs to the people. In the words of an eminent writer on banking and political economy, "Banking is a trade, and only a trade, and nothing can be more surely established by a larger experience than that a government which interferes with any trade injures that trade. The best thing undeniably that a government can do with the money market is to let it take care of itself."

We may safely conclude that the public do not desire a State currency, which must in the nature of things be of a multiform and complex character, but instead a circulation that shall be uniform in every State, and so secured and redeemable that its quality will never be questioned or its holders entertain misgivings as to its absolute safety. Conceding this to be so, can that result be obtained under the State system or under the present national plan?

I believe it is entirely practicable to frame a system of banking which shall at once preserve all the excellent qualities of the national plan and still be free from the defects which are conspicuous in that, while it will be wholly removed from the tendencies to abuse and mismanagement which it is gravely apprehended inhere in that.

A PLAN FOR FREE BANKING, WITH STATE BANKS AND A NATIONAL CURRENCY.

How, then, can we secure a uniform and stable circulation with a system of free banking applicable to all the States and under State supervision?

First. Let the Federal Government issue the circulation of the country.

Secondly. Circulation shall be issued only to banks duly organized under the laws of the State wherein located.

Thirdly. Any bank so organized, may, on the requisition of the State department which exercises supervisory power over it, receive as much circulation as it shall deposit United States bonds with the General Government to secure the redemption of its bills.

Fourthly. The bills issued to one bank shall present the same appearance as those of like denomination issued to any other bank, except the imprint on the bill of the name and location of the bank, which shall indicate to what bank issued and by what bank redeemable.

Fifthly. All circulation so issued shall be redeemed by the bank to which it is issued, in specie, at one or more of the great money centers of the country.

Sixthly. All bills to be sent in the first instance to the banking department, or other State department authorized by law in the several States, for registration before delivery to the banks.

Seventhly. The organization, direction, and supervision of all banks, the rate of interest paid, and all the practical details of banking, to be left to the legislation of the several States.

This plan would conform substantially to the free-banking law of 1838, adopted in our own State, except that the paper money, instead of being local and diversified, would be uniform and national in its character. Congress would exercise the constitutional powers delegated to it in regulating the currency of the country, and the States the exclusive control of its adaptation to the wants of the people, the requirements of trade, the growth and expansion of commerce, and the manufacturing industries of the nation. The volume of circulation would always be graduated by the inexorable law of supply and demand; would expand and contract in obedience to the general laws of trade, and not at the clamor of financial pretenders, or the selfish demands of adventurers and speculators. Money is only an arbitrary standard by which values are measured, intrinsically of little worth, and valuable only so far as it represents a purchasing power of material values. Why, then, should the representative of values be restricted in its volume more than the actual values themselves, except so far as the lessons of intelligent experience teach the amount required to meet the varying conditions of commerce? Gold and silver being the recognized standard in all countries by which values are measured and determined, including paper money, it becomes necessary to redeem on demand a paper currency in coin, in order to give it stability and a uniform value approximating in the highest degree to gold value.

The serious objection to State bills issued under our free-banking law and the banking laws of other States was the want of uniformity of value. While a bill might pass current in the State where it was issued, it became less current the farther removed from that State because it was local in its character, and depended on local securities for its ultimate redemption; hence the bills of one State were not as acceptable nor as widely diffused throughout the country, even in our own internal commerce, as the bills of another—the legitimate result of the superiority of the system of banking, and the stability and quality of the securities pledged for their redemption of one State over another.

The free banking system of New York was regarded as the most perfect which was ever devised, prior to the establishment of the national plan. The national system is one of the products of war. It is equal proof of the soundness and excellence of our free-banking laws that the national law is a transcript in the most of its essential features and fundamental principles from the New York laws. It is in the novel and distinctive characteristics of the national plan, that the gravest defects and the most serious jars are found in the practical operations of the national banks. Hence the national scheme furnishes both positive and negative testimony of the superiority of the New York plan. The merits of the national system are borrowed; its defects are original. Its sole conspicuous advantage is uniform currency. The plan I have submitted, it is believed, will embrace the practically proven merits of both, without the known defects of either.

There is no emergency, either political or financial, at present, which requires the maintenance of the harsh and prohibitory provisions and needless discriminations against State banks, which exist in the national system. I respectfully submit that your honorable body should request the Representatives of the State in Congress to endeavor to procure such legislation as will relieve the State banks from their present condition, and will insure for them the exercise of the powers and the enjoyment of the rights now possessed by the national banks in respect to circulation. The plan which I have proposed would secure these without any violent disturbance of existing institutions, while it would greatly contribute to the agencies which serve the business interests and commerce of the people of this and of other States.

On the 5th of January and on the 19th of February I made remarks on this subject to the Senate. I take this gentleman, from whose report I have just read, to be a good financier; and as he agrees with me, it is natural that I should think so. He made his report to the Legislature of New York on the 6th of January, and I made my first speech on the 5th of January; but I do not think he stole anything from me, and I do not think I could have got anything from him. It only shows that men will agree sometimes about the same thing, though they are a great distance apart and have not communicated with each other.

Now, sir, I am opposed to free banking under the Federal Government, although I am in favor of an expansion of the currency. Believing that the country, particularly the West—the section whence I come—needs it, I shall vote for an expansion of the currency. But at the same time I wish it to be distinctly understood that I have never been a friend of this system, and am not now. I am opposed to the whole system, and believe it to be radically wrong. I am in favor of specie payments at some future time, and hope that day will come around soon; but in the mean time I am willing that my section of the country shall have some means of trading and doing business. I said in my speech of the 5th of January:

While I hope to see the day when this entire system will be changed, yet for the time being, and because our wants are pressing, I urge an issue of fifty millions—not for the West, but for the entire country—knowing now that the most of it will go to New York and other eastern cities

Let all this system, however, Mr. President, be of short duration. It is not competent for this Government, or any government, to make money beyond coining metal, gold and silver; and if the Government were competent, in a country like ours—composed of different States, spreading over a continent, and extending across different latitudes, with different productions, different wants—it is impossible for the national Government to exercise wisely this power. Both as a political and a commercial question, such a power should not be in the Federal Government. The States are the proper agents to discharge this duty. Each State, knowing its wants and its needs, can do this with more wisdom and without any danger of overissue. But owing to the fact that we have different States, extending over a continent, with varied and different productions, the necessity of uniformity in value becomes of paramount importance. While my idea is that the States should have the power to charter as many banks as they might think proper, they being the judge of the amount of money they require, I would have a law for the entire nation, requiring all the States to deposit United States bonds, as is now required by the law authorizing national banks, and as the nation is responsible for these bonds, and would have possession of them, to assume, as is now the law, the payment of the circulation. This would give uniform value to the circulation. To this general law each State would be required to conform. This would take from the Federal Government the power to control now exercised by Congress and the Secretary of the Treasury. This system of banking I would call State independence with national security.

On the 19th of February I said:

Mr. President, I hope to see the day when this whole system will be wiped out; when such a thing as the Federal Government making paper and calling it money will be a thing of the past. The whole subject should be as speedily as possible removed from the Halls of Congress and remitted to the States. The resolution I introduced some time ago, and now before the Committee on Finance, fully explains my views on the subject. Let each State be the judge of the amount of banking capital its business wants require, as also the number of banks. Let each one provide what security it may deem proper for its depositors. Yet, as the notes issued perform a function which is national, because they circulate in every part of the country, the security for their redemption should also be national. This would be effected by the deposit of Government bonds as now required by the national banking law—State independence with national security.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's ten minutes have expired.

Mr. HAMLIN obtained the floor.

Mr. CAMERON. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to make a correction in the amendment?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CAMERON. My object in presenting the amendment the other day was to repeal all acts which limited the circulation of the national-bank notes. I had written the twenty-second section and sent it to the Clerk so; but in order to remove all doubt on that subject, I move now that the word "twenty-seven," in the first line of section 3, be made "twenty-two."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment is not in order at the present time, unless the Senator from Illinois chooses to accept it.

Mr. CAMERON. I think the Senator will.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly; I offered the amendment in lieu of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understand that the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BOGY,] both from his reading from a report of some gentleman in New York and from speeches which he has made in this body, is opposed to the present banking system, and in favor of what he calls the independent State banking system. Am I correct?

Mr. BOGY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then I wish to ask the Senator one other question. Does he not believe that the passage of the bill now before us will aid in producing that result?

Mr. BOGY. Will aid in producing a State system?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes. If you pass into a bill the amendments now pending before us, I ask if the Senator does not believe it will hasten the very result which he desires to accomplish; in other words, break down the present system and create some other?

Mr. BOGY. It might in that way break down the present system; but otherwise I do not see that it would bring about a State system. The abuses of the present system may possibly break it down; but that would not in a legitimate way lead to a State system. I am in favor of a State system, with national security. I am in favor of each State providing the means of security for the depositors, the administration of the bank, the examination of the bank, the reserves, and all those things. All I would retain in the Federal Government would be that feature which in itself is national, the circulation, so that a note issued from a bank in Kansas might permeate this whole Republic, the nation being interested. I want a banking system with a redemption in gold as soon as possible.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understand the Senator. I only wish to say that I do not agree with the Senator in his first proposition. I am not opposed to our present banking system; but I do agree with him, if such be his opinion, that the passage into a law of these propositions now before the Senate would hasten the very result he desires to accomplish.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the best method of breaking down the present system, and making it so odious that no party can carry it, is to maintain its monopoly feature. I move to strike out the second section of the original bill, and call for its reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment now pending proposing to perfect the substitute. That will take precedence of any other motion; but the Senator can have the section read if he desires.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to understand the ruling of the Chair. I suppose it has been the practice of the Senate to allow a bill to be perfected before a vote was taken on the adoption of a substitute for the bill. If there is any objection to that in the present stage of this bill, it must be because the Senator from Illinois has offered an amendment to the substitute of the Senator from North Carolina; but I hardly see how that makes any difference in the rule. You may perfect the original measure before a vote is taken on striking it out and substituting some other. I should like to know what the ruling is.

Mr. MORTON. Does the Chair rule my motion out of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does rule it out of order at the present time. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.]

Mr. HOWE. I wish the Senator from Illinois would modify his amendment for the present, or at least I wish he would move the first section of it separately. I have once voted for that proposition. Although the situation is somewhat changed since I gave that vote, it is not so much changed but that I shall feel compelled to vote for it again. If the Senate should agree to that or disagree to that, there would be no embarrassment in moving then the second section. I cannot vote for the second section of the amendment, and I cannot vote for the first section of it with the second. I can see no necessity for crippling the banks as it is proposed to cripple them by that section.

I noticed that the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] in explaining the measure that he reported, called this a "strengthening of the banks." I do not understand how it strengthens the banks to require them to pile up coin, which they cannot use, in their vaults. If you are to require them to invest the same amount of capital it would take to get this coin in real estate or in neat cattle or in something that might earn something, that might strengthen the banks. But, as the Senator from Connecticut has remarked, you command the banks to snatch from the community that which is of use to them, put it beyond the reach of the community and where it subserves no purpose whatever. Besides, is it treating the banks in good faith? You have required them to purchase certain bonds, which bonds are issued by the Government of the United States and promise to pay the holder a certain amount of interest every year. The holders of those bonds hold the promise of the Government that they shall receive so much coin every year. Now, you do not repudiate in terms that promise. You say to them, "We will still pay the coin but you shall not use the coin." How much better, practically, that is than repudiation, I will not undertake to say. It is something better, I admit. It is not the identical thing; nor does it seem to me to be the performance of the promise which you have made to the purchasers of bonds. Therefore I cannot vote for that second section. I will vote for the first section.

I want to say to the other Senator from Ohio who sits farthest from me [Mr. THURMAN] that when he says that we have already under the statute an authority for the freest banking that anybody could desire, I think he either misinterprets our statutes or I do. I believe that arson or burglary is just as free as banking. I know that any corporation may issue notes under your laws upon the condition that they are to be redeemed in coin. But you have two laws. One says, to a certain number of favored corporations, "You may issue notes convertible into other paper;" paper just as abundant and more abundant in the community than the notes they are permitted to issue. Now, when you find another statute on the book which says to all other men, "You may issue notes also, if you will redeem them on demand in something worth 15 or 20 per cent. more than the first class of notes are redeemable in," it does not seem to me that that answers any part of the definition of free banking. I say the law authorizes the Senator to commit arson to-day if he pays the penalty; at all events he can commit it if he stands the penalty. That is the only condition upon which any one, except the favored corporations, can issue notes. They must pay the penalty. It is not quite so severe as that imposed upon arson, but it is heavy enough to stop effectually the issue of notes here.

I wish the Senator from Illinois would be content to take the vote of the Senate first on the first section of his amendment, and then if he insists upon the second section, try the sense of the Senate on that.

Mr. LOGAN. When the vote comes on that, we can arrange that proposition.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to understand whether the pending question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana to strike out the second section, or the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] The Chair will state that the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] was to strike out the bill and insert the amendment which he offered. The motion of the Senator from Illinois is to amend the amendment which it is proposed to substitute for the bill. The Chair rules that this amendment to the amendment must be first disposed of. After that is done, the amendment being complete and perfect, then the question will be, shall that be substituted for the bill? Then the friends of the bill can perfect the bill, of course, by striking out or adding to it or amending it otherwise. If this were not so, there would be two amendments pending before the Senate at the same time.

Mr. LOGAN. No doubt the decision of the Chair is right; but in order to relieve this matter and test the sense of the Senate on the second section of the bill reported by the committee, that the Senator from Indiana wishes to strike out, which seems to me to be a very obnoxious section, and which I am in favor of striking out, I will withdraw temporarily the amendment I offered to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, so that the question then will recur on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois withdraws his amendment to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. Now the motion of the Senator from Indiana is in order, which is to strike out the second section of the original bill. Is that the motion?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WRIGHT. I rose for the purpose of addressing myself to the proposition of the Senator from Illinois to amend the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is no longer pending.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have nothing to say on the pending amendment, but I have on the other amendment when it shall be offered. But I wish to say this, inasmuch as it seems to be taken by consent here that there is no power to amend the bill in the attitude that it was at the time the decision was made, that I have very great doubts of the correctness of that ruling, and I trust the Senate will not accept it as the conclusive ruling of the Chair or the Senate on that question.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to take the sense of the Senate on the proposition involved in the second section of the original bill to authorize any person having $1,000 in greenbacks, or any multiple thereof, to convert them on demand into bonds drawing 5 per cent. interest in gold, payable in gold at the Treasury of the United States at any time after ten years. The object of that section, as I understand, on the part of the chairman of the committee, is to bring greenbacks to gold value on the 1st of January, 1876, by authorizing them to be converted into a bond which of itself is at par in gold. His argument is that as the 5 per cent. bond is at par in gold, when you authorize the conversion of the greenbacks into that bond, you make them of the same value, thereby bringing the greenbacks up to par in gold; in other words, you resume specie payments.

In the first place, if it is to have that effect, I am opposed to it. To make a change of 10 per cent. or 12 per cent. in the value of the greenback in twenty-two months, by the 1st of January, 1876, is too sudden. It will be disastrous to the business of the country; it makes too great a change in values. It adds 10 per cent. to the burden of every debt so far as the debtor is concerned, and it adds 10 per cent. to the value of it so far as the creditor is concerned, while there are very few debts in the country that have not been contracted upon the present value of the greenbacks, or even when they were of less value than they are to-day. If it is to have that effect, I am opposed to it because it would be a great hardship and result in extensive bankruptcy, great derangement, and even panic, to make a change of 10 or 12 per cent. in the value of our currency in twenty-two months. It ought to be much more gradual than that. That is my first argument.

My second is that if it will not have that effect, to bring the greenback up to par, then there is no object in it; the public debt is increased for no purpose. There can be no object in converting a non-interest-bearing debt into an interest-bearing debt if it is not to have the effect spoken of by the chairman of the committee; and if it does have that effect, it will be disastrous, as I before remarked.

In the next place, I am opposed to this section because it reposes in the Secretary of the Treasury the discretion to contract the whole greenback currency. He is authorized to convert all the greenbacks into 5 per cent. bonds, and then to pay out the notes for the public debt in the redemption of 6 per cent. bonds, or current expenses, at his pleasure. If the Secretary is of opinion that bonds ought not to be bought with greenbacks when they come into the Treasury, or that the current expenses of the Government ought not to be paid with them, he is authorized to hold them and thus to contract the currency to the amount of the whole volume of greenbacks. It reads:

> And the Secretary of the Treasury may reissue the United States notes so received, or, if they are canceled, may issue United States notes to the same amount, either to purchase or redeem the public debt, or to meet the current payments for the public service.

It gives to the Secretary of the Treasury the discretion to contract the entire volume of the greenback currency. He may pay it out or he may not, in his own discretion. The Senator from Ohio yesterday said that he had the same discretion now. I say not. The Secretary at present has discretion so far as the surplus revenue is concerned, which is now nothing. But if there happens to be surplus revenue, he may invest that in bonds or not, at his discretion, and he therefore has the discretion now as to the surplus revenue. We have had surplus in times past, we have none now, and if this policy is to be adopted we shall not have any, in my opinion, for many years to come.

But this section of the bill authorizes the conversion of all the greenbacks into 5 per cent. bonds, and the holding in the Treasury all the greenbacks thus received, so as to convert the entire volume, if you please, which will have the effect to destroy all the national banks, and destroy the business of the country; because when you contract the greenbacks you take them into the vaults, the banks can no longer redeem with them, they cannot get their reserves, and they are compelled to wind up.

Mr. President, this is all I have to say now.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I think the Senator from Indiana is mistaken in regard to his idea of the effect of preserving this section of the bill. His idea seems to be that it will bring ruin on the country if legal-tender notes are converted into interest-bearing bonds. Now, I submit whether there can be any injury to the business of the country unless there is somewhere a depression; unless there is a reduction somewhere in values. But this section proposes to depress nothing, unless it is possible you may say it depresses the value of gold. On the contrary, the effect of this section will be to increase the value of legal-tender notes, and I submit that there is not a man from one end of this nation to the other who can be in the least injured by raising the value of the legal-tender notes toward the gold standard. This, in my judgment, would be the effect of retaining a measure of this kind.

Further, I should hope, if that privilege is permitted the American people, it would be followed by another privilege; and that would be of exchanging bonds for legal-tender notes. If that should be adopted and become a law, there would be an interchangeability between notes and bonds, and they would hang upon the pivot of a 5 per cent. interest; and upon that pivot they would sway forward and back, up and down, according to the demands of the business of the country.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me to ask a question?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I ask my friend from Connecticut this question: If by the adoption of this provision you change the value of the greenback note 10 or 12 per cent. in twenty-two months, give it that much additional value, what is the effect of that upon the debtor class of the country? I ask him if it does not increase the difficulty of paying debts just the extent of the appreciation?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Well, if I owed $1,000, and had the greenbacks to pay it with, and you should enact a law making these greenbacks worth 12 per cent. more, I think I could pay my debt just as easily as I could before.

But I was going to remark that this interchangeability cannot work any such evil, in my judgment, as some members of this body anticipate. The Senator from Indiana thinks there would be an absorption of the greenbacks into bonds. Who will put his greenbacks into bonds? He only who holds the money and cannot use it so as to make a profit of more than 5 per cent. If he can use it in his business so that it shall be worth more than that, he will retain it in his business as a wise man; but when money concentrates, as it does at some seasons of the year, as every Senator knows, so that it becomes a drug, there is a surplus that is not wanted for legitimate business at this rate of interest, and then the holder of these notes could go to the Treasury and take his bond. Again, suppose business to revive, and he should see a way in which he could use his money to a greater advantage than by holding his 5 per cent. bonds; then he would be pressed by his interest to go to the Treasury and take his bonds and get the greenbacks.

Mr. MORTON. The section does not provide for that.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I say the section should be followed by that provision, and I do not hesitate to say that, according to the best judgment I am able to mature on this subject, there is no other suggestion which has been made to the Senate that would so adapt itself to the business interests of the public as that which would allow men to fund their notes into bonds and then to reconvert the bonds into currency according as their interests should demand. I do hope, notwithstanding the fears of some men on this subject, that plan may be tried; for I am sure if it is not, if you adopt a policy of free banking, and with it make no provision for a redemption in anything better than an exchange of notes which are of equal value, then the business interests of this country are on the road to inflation and the result will be positively evil. Free banking without redemption is no help to the business of this nation.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, in the observations that I submitted to the Senate a few days ago I stated my opposition to this section in the form in which it now stands, and gave very briefly the reasons why I thought it was too stringent and harsh a measure. I said then that if it would have the effect which the committee supposed it would have of appreciating greenbacks to gold by the 1st of January, 1876, although it would be very desirable to get back to specie payments, that would be too severe upon the debtor class, and would result in the bankruptcy, perhaps, or their failure to perform their promises, of the national banks. These reasons the Senator from Indiana has repeated. But he has suggested another objection to this section that in my judgment has no force or validity whatsoever. He says if it becomes a law, it will be in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to contract the volume of the currency by drawing in greenbacks and keeping them in the Treasury. Why, Mr. President, the Secretary of the Treasury can only pay out money in pursuance of appropriations made by law. He can pay it in no other mode, for the Constitution itself forbids it, and he can pay out no more than is appropriated; and whether he make payments in the national-bank notes that are received into the Treasury or whether he make payments in the greenbacks that shall be received into the Treasury, the effect upon the volume of circulation will be precisely the same.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly, provided it is not taken out of my ten minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does come out of the Senator's time.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I must beg that the Senator will move another amendment at some other time and put his question then. But can anything be clearer than that? How can the Secretary of the Treasury hoard these greenbacks in the Treasury if there are appropriations that require him to pay them out? If there are appropriations that require him to make payments of money out of the Treasury, what difference does it make whether he pay out national-bank notes which have been received or whether he pay out greenbacks? So far as the volume of the currency is concerned, it makes no single particle of difference. There is therefore no contraction by the Secretary of the Treasury caused by hoarding greenbacks in the Treasury involved in this section.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator certainly does not mean that. Will he allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. THURMAN. I will.

Mr. MORTON. If $100,000,000 of greenbacks are brought to the Treasury under this section of the bill, the Secretary of the Treasury is bound to give 5 per cent. bonds for them. He has then got $100,000,000 of greenbacks in addition to his revenues. We will suppose that he has revenues enough to meet the current expenses of the Government. Then this bill gives him the discretion either to put this additional $100,000,000 of greenbacks into 6 per cent. bonds, or to hold them in the Treasury. If he holds them in the Treasury, as he has power to do, it is contraction to that amount. Will the Senator deny that?

Mr. THURMAN. Suppose that to be so, that is not hoarding by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MORTON. I say he keeps them there; he contracts to that amount.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Allow me to say a single word. The Senator from Indiana thinks it would be a contraction while the money would be in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MORTON. It would not be in circulation then.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. It would not be in circulation. That he calls taking money out of circulation. Where would it have been before? If it was not wanted in business, it would have been locked up in the vaults of the banks. Would it have been in circulation then?

Mr. MORTON. It might not come from banks at all; it might come from private persons who wanted to invest in that way.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senate will see in a moment that the Senator from Indiana has now shifted his objection to another portion of the section. The contraction would not result from any action of the Secretary of the Treasury, as he supposed, but would result from the fact that greenbacks might be funded in 5 per cent. bonds. If that provision is not right strike it out; but so far as the action of the Secretary of the Treasury is concerned, so far as any volition on his part is concerned, which would result in a contraction of the currency, there is nothing of it in the section.

Now, what is the practical common sense of this business? It is simply this: Suppose the effect of this section, if it become a law, should be to appreciate greenbacks to the par of gold; suppose that should be its effect because the Government would give 5 per cent. bonds equal to gold at par for its greenback; would that cause all the greenbacks to be converted into bonds? No, sir; no more than a specie-paying bank is required to pay all its notes in specie. When a bank pays specie, and everybody understands that it pays specie, those who hold its notes make no run upon it. It is only when they become doubtful whether it will pay specie or not that they make a run upon it. So, too, when it was known that the Government would give a 5 per cent. bond equal to gold at par for the greenback, and that that bond could be obtained at any time, it would not produce a run of greenbacks on the Treasury for 5 per cent. bonds. If they become by that measure equal to gold, and they may be used to more advantage than the 5 per cent. bonds, if, in the language of the Senator from Connecticut, they produce a greater profit in business, nobody in his senses would think of demanding 5 per cent. bonds for them.

My own opinion is that, inasmuch as the average rate of interest in this country almost everywhere is greater than 5 per cent., if you were to-day to say that these greenbacks should be converted into 5 per cent. bonds, the conversion at the Treasury would be very limited indeed, extremely limited. There are very few men who are willing to give up their currency for a 5 per cent. bond; and the proof of it is that our 5 per cent. bonds are being hawked about in the European markets because there is no sale for them at home. No, sir; that is not the danger; but the danger, and the only danger of this section as it now stands, is, that you appreciate the price of greenbacks too rapidly. I said before that if it would have the effect that the chairman of the Committee on Finance supposed it would have, it would be too harsh upon the debtor, and would endanger the national banks; and how endanger them? It would bring them up to specie payments on the 1st of January, 1876. Would they be able to pay specie on the 1st of January, 1876, and thenceforth? I fear they would not; and I fear, therefore, that the only result of it would be that Congress would be appealed to then to change this very law for the alleviation of the national banks, and the prevention of the forfeiture of all their charters.

These are the substantial objections to this section, and not any idea whatsoever that greenbacks will be too rapidly converted into 5 per cent. bonds.

But, Mr. President, I should like if the Senator from Indiana would designate when, if ever, these greenbacks are to be paid in gold. He says, and I think with him, that the 1st of January, 1876, is too soon. Does he mean that there shall never be a redemption? If he does not, what day instead of the 1st of January, 1876, would he name as the day on which the Government of the United States shall begin to redeem its promises? I should like to know that. Perhaps he will retort by saying, "What is your plan?" Why, Mr. President, we are told that the Senator is in a majority on this question, and that it is something almost like impertinence for us in the minority even to suggest an amendment——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's ten minutes have expired.

Mr. THURMAN. I believe I shall have to move an amendment, some way or other, to get to finish my sentence, when it is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order now.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I shall have to wait for another time.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I shall be obliged to vote for the motion to strike out this second section unless it can be amended. The section contains a provision to the effect that on the 1st of January, 1876, the Secretary of the Treasury shall be required to pay the United States notes in gold coin, and yet in the whole bill there is no provision giving the Secretary a dollar of gold coin wherewith to pay. Such a provision does not amount to the dignity of legislation. It is calling upon the Secretary to make brick without straw; it is keeping the "promise to the ear," but "breaking it to the hope."

The next provision is that if he cannot pay in coin he is to redeem the United States notes in 5 per cent. bonds. Suppose one hundred millions of United States notes are presented and funded. That certainly produces a serious contraction.

And how are these notes to be again put in circulation? There are two methods for their circulation mentioned in the bill, but only one is available. One provision is that the notes may be used in paying the expenses of the public service; but the provision of the sixth section says that nothing in the bill shall be construed to increase the principal of the public debt of the United States; and using these notes which shall have once been funded would be increasing that principal indebtedness. Hence the only possible mode of placing these notes again in circulation is by the Secretary of the Treasury buying bonds; and he may buy them as fast or as tardily as he sees proper; and the question of contraction or expansion in the money market is left to the discretion of one man.

Mr. MORTON. He may not buy them at all.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. He may expend all he has in bonds, or he may not buy them at all. Now, Mr. President, to hurry on, for I wish not to lose my time, there should be a provision to take the place of the second section. That provision should look to the resumption of specie payments. There is no Senator or member of Congress who does not profess to believe resumption most desirable; because the faith of the nation is pledged, because all would keep the credit of the nation good abroad as well as at home, because all would increase our circulating medium by introducing the gold currents of the world, because we would have a fixed and stable standard of values so that business may cease to be a mere game of chance, because we do not wish to encourage wild speculation. For these reasons, thus briefly referred to, all members of Congress profess to favor the resumption of specie payments.

How are we to attain that end? Not by possessing the Treasury of an amount of gold sufficient to meet dollar for dollar all our promises. That is impossible and is also unnecessary, and would not effect the result; because as soon as we had redeemed all our promises, we being debtors, must make new promises for constantly accruing indebtedness, and those promises we would be under obligations again to redeem. How are we to resume specie payments? In one way only, and that is by establishing the faith, the confidence, of the people of the country in the belief, not that we can pay specie dollar for dollar in a time of panic, but that we can in the regular course of business meet our promises in gold. How shall we establish that faith and confidence?

In 1838 and 1839, in 1858 and 1859, when our banks resumed, they had less than 33 per cent. of gold for their circulation, and yet with that they resumed. The credit of the United States is vastly better than ever was the credit of the banks; and, besides, large amounts of the United States notes being required as a reserve for the banks would never reach the Treasury. Thirty-three per cent. on $400,000,000 is $133,000,000. The receipts in gold by our Government are $180,000,000 a year. The expenditures of the Government, in gold, counting everything, are $136,000,000 a year, leaving a surplus balance of gold per year of $44,000,000. In three years $44,000,000 amounts to $132,000,000, or about as much as is necessary to give 33 per cent. on the $400,000,000 of our notes. The income from our mines is $73,000,000 a year, as I am satisfied, and admitting that $50,000,000 of that amount goes abroad, we have $23,000,000 a year remaining here. This we could purchase with bonds. Three times twenty-three is sixty-nine, making from this source $69,000,000, while the $132,000,000 from surplus makes $201,000,000 in three years. Thus the policy of accumulating gold by means of our surplus, and by giving the Secretary of the Treasury the right to purchase gold from our own mines, without even going abroad, would give us an accumulation which would render it safe to commence specie payments. In four or five years it certainly would amount to a sufficient sum. And besides there is not less than one hundred and fifty millions of gold that is hoarded in the country, and this would be brought into circulation.

In order to continue specie payments I would authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, as he receives the United States notes which would be brought to par by their convertibility, to exchange them from time to time for coin at par, and thus constantly replenish the Treasury in gold and prevent its exhaustion; and to do this we should give him the power to issue bonds for the purchase of gold as the market would render it wise and prudent for him to do so.

There should be one other provision, that in case of a failure of ability to redeem in coin the Secretary should be at liberty to redeem in bonds. That, while it renders redemption certain, is a feature of the plan I suggest which involves the possible contingency of contraction. Everything else in the method of resumption looks to a healthful expansion of our circulating medium. And if any one objects to the possibility of contraction from the absorption of United States notes in bonds, you may omit that feature of the plan. We would have gold enough for all notes that would ever be presented.

Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio asked what day should be fixed for the commencement of the resumption of specie payments. Sir, in my opinion it is fatal to resumption to fix any day. Fix a day and gold will be hoarded and the price enhanced so that you cannot get it, while at the same time——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to speak about five minutes longer.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope the Senator from New Jersey will be allowed to go on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no right to stop the Senator. He only admonishes him that he has spoken ten minutes.

Mr. CAMERON. Then I move that the Senator be allowed to speak five minutes longer.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not want over two minutes.

Mr. HAMLIN. I would not violate the rule a minute.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that cannot be done.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to hear the Senator from New Jersey go on.

Mr. ANTHONY. The rule has been practically violated; that is to say, a Senator has spoken ten minutes on a motion which he does not intend to press.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator has no right to make that statement. I am pressing that very motion now.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am mistaken, then; but I so understood.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I will give way to the Senator from New Jersey if he desires to go on.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to talk two or three minutes, and I shall not trouble the Senate on this motion again.

I was just saying that there are fatal objections to fixing any day; that if we did gold would be hoarded so that it could not be reached; that there would be a hoarding of greenbacks so as to rush them on the Treasury. On the day fixed the condition of the money market might be most unpropitious for resumption; while, if no time be fixed, the public would see the accumulation going on, business would adjust itself to it, and resumption would come upon this country as noiselessly and as benignantly as the spring and summer come upon the earth. What is essential to successful resumption is to render it by your preparation certain and inevitable that at some not too remote day resumption must come. Then obstacles will disappear. And now while we are expanding our currency, while we are increasing the circulation, let me ask those who are in favor of these measures whether they will not, out of respect to the large minority who differ from them in policy, consent to incorporate into their plan some measure, some step, be it ever so short, tending toward the ultimate resumption of specie payments.

Mr. President, there are but two possible ways in which we can resume. One measure is that suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] which has not received from the Senate the attention it deserved, which is to withdraw the United States notes from circulation, and permit the national banks to furnish the currency, and let them fight the gold-brokers, and by combination and concert of policy effect resumption; and thus the Government would become free of all responsibility in the matter. The other plan is to continue our present plan of permitting the national banks to redeem in United States notes, and for the Government to make the United States notes convertible into coin. Perhaps either one of these two measures would be successful; but to hold that the national banks shall redeem only in United States notes, and that these notes need not be convertible, is to dispense with the precious metals, and to cast the country upon a wild sea of inflation and speculation. And the result is not uncertain. Speculation will follow this inflating measure; depression will eventually follow speculation; and then the cry for "Paper; more paper," will come, and we will go staggering on from bog to bog, until we are cast in the slough of national dishonor, bankruptcy, and disgrace. I beg those who are in favor of this measure of increasing our currency to consider whether they will not incorporate into their policy some measure, be it ever so inconsiderable, which must ultimately, be it ever so remote, result in preserving the honor and credit of this great nation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, it is very natural for those who have thought on a subject like this to have a pretty decided opinion and not to desire to yield it, especially upon a vital point. Now I say that the Committee on Finance have recommended to the Senate for two successive years the very plan suggested by the Senator from New Jersey. We have in this bill provided, as one means looking toward specie payments, a gradual retirement of the greenbacks. We have provided another means which, as sure as fate, will bring us to the specie standard at the time fixed. The Senator says we must accumulate gold. So be it. We must provide means and ways by which specie payments may some time be attained. So be it. Ample time is before us to do this. He has wedded himself, however, to a particular plan of doing it. He wants us to accumulate gold in the Treasury, which will lie idle in the Treasury until some remote period shall demand its use. He also wants to place in the Secretary of the Treasury the power to sell our 6 per cent. bonds at par in gold to maintain specie payments at all times. I say that that plan is impracticable; it has been voted down and opposed, and scarcely therefore ought to be now brought forward again.

Here is a proposition that, without cost to the Government, without danger, will surely and infallibly, as he admits himself, bring us to the specie standard. Now if the time is too soon, that can be easily altered. All we say to the holder of the note is "If we cannot now or next year pay you your note in coin, we will give you that which in the money market of the world for seventy years of our history has been at par in coin."

I do not wish to extend this argument or take a single moment of time. There never has been but one point of difficulty with me about this matter, and that was as to the time that should be fixed. Every nation in the world, when under a suspension of specie payments has fixed a time in order to resume; the United States have done it; other countries have done it; and we ought to do it now. I have no objection to taking the sense of the Senate as to the time when this shall occur, and let each Senator express his opinion on that point. But this proposition to me is a vital point in this bill, for it is the only measure that looks to or contemplates the specie standard; the only one that will bring up our notes nearer and nearer to par with gold; which will as inevitably as the march of time bring us nearer and nearer to the gold standard, and which when the time arrives will enable us to maintain specie payments without any more contraction. Why, sir, the fear that the greenbacks will float in any large numbers for the bonds is idle. The greenbacks are held by the banks as part of their reserve. They are held in circulation all over the country. The right to convert them at any time is a right which, being enjoyed at any time, will always maintain them at the par of the bonds. The only danger is the possible depreciation of the bonds below the par of gold. As a matter of course that can be but very small, not more than 1 or 2 per cent. There is no real danger in it at all. The whole amount that will probably be required to maintain these notes at par with the bonds or with gold would not be more than ten to twenty million dollars.

As to the time, I am perfectly willing to take the sense of the Senate. But for us to start now upon an increase of paper money, irredeemable, with free banking, either on the plan proposed by the Committee on Finance or the plan proposed by the Senator from Illinois, is sure and certain depreciation, distress, panic, and bankruptcy. There can be no doubt of it. No nation ever passed through this history but what has taken these successive stages.

Sir, in 1862 when I advocated the legal-tender act, and in 1863 when I introduced and advocated the national banking act, we all pointed out—I remember that I did earnestly—the danger of the system, that the issuing of greenbacks, if carried beyond a certain point, would make them no better than the French assignats; also that the organization of national banks that did not look some time to specie payments would undoubtedly bring us to bankruptcy. Sir, I have a pride that our nation will do what other nations have not done; that it will redeem in due time, and as rapidly as possible, the promise of the nation, whether in the form of United States notes or bank-notes. Section 2 of this bill contains the easiest, simplest, and plainest plan. I appeal to Senators who desire the more equal distribution of bank circulation, and who desire more paper money, not to embark in this scheme without some counteracting policy. If we must have more money, so be it. I do not fear more money. What I want is good money, better money, growing better day by day, until, in the language of the act of 1869, at the earliest day practicable it shall be at par with coin, and I do upon my responsibility believe that this section has in it the germ that will bring us to that position.

As to the proposition of my honorable friend from Connecticut, I see no objection to it, although I see no occasion for it. I have no objection at all to saying that at all times we will give to the holder of the 6 per cent. five-twenty bonds of the United States our greenbacks for them; but I do not think it is necessary, because the power is vested in the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out the notes for those bonds, and it is amply sufficient to accomplish the purpose. Therefore there is no occasion for that proposition, although I would not object to its being inserted. It would give, perhaps, a little more confidence to the measure. I would be willing to give any holder of a note the right to apply for a 5 per cent. bond, and give to the holder of a 6 per cent. bond, if you choose, the right to demand a greenback within the limits provided by the law. But I do not think that clause is necessary, and I hope my friend from Connecticut will not press it, because the power, being in the Secretary of the Treasury, will always be anxiously used for the purpose of redeeming and gathering in the 6 per cent. bonds of the United States.

As to the fear and the danger that the Secretary will abuse this power, it is utterly idle. The Secretary of the Treasury now has the power to sell $50,000,000 of gold which is in the Treasury of the United States and convert it into greenbacks and retire them wholly in his vaults. Would he dare do it? Whenever there is a talk about the abuse of these great powers in the hands of one of the high officers of the Government it is always a scarecrow. There is no danger of the exercise of such a power. Why, sir, during the war and since the war these powers have been with the Secretary of the Treasury at all times, and necessarily must be, and they never have been abused yet. It is true there have been differences of opinion. The Secretary of the Treasury has sometimes exercised a power which other persons thought he had not; but it was always under circumstances or on occasions which entirely excused the Secretary from all imputation of doing anything that was wrong. The discretionary power to pay out these notes in the payment of bonds is one that cannot be abused.

Sir, the action of this section is automatic, it will regulate itself. If notes commenced flowing into the Treasury for bonds, a very small amount would be thus presented until the notes would rise to par in gold; and then, when the notes were at par in gold, they could be used in the redemption or purchase of 6 per cent. bonds, and as a matter of course it would be always the pride and anxious desire of the Secretary of the Treasury to use them for that purpose. I suppose my time is out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has spoken nine minutes.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Mr. President, I do not quite like the phraseology of the section of the bill to which the Senator from Ohio has reference. He thinks the Secretary of the Treasury has the discretion, and I doubt not he has under the provisions of the act; but I want it so clearly defined, that whether he shall give me a bond or note if I go to him shall not be determined by his will, but by my own. As I demand, I would like bonds or greenbacks; and I would prefer the "shall" to the "will," so far as it relates to the discretion of the honorable Secretary.

I differ a little, perhaps not very much, from the opinions which have been expressed by some gentlemen in regard to the fixing of a time for the resumption of specie payments. I do not know that I have any very serious objection to it, but I do not hesitate to say that I have no more confidence in it than the honorable Senator from New Jersey. I cannot see how any legislation can bring about specie payments at a specified time. I cannot see how legal statutes will make it possible for the Government or the banks to meet all demands which might be made for specie at the specific time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has spoken ten minutes on this question.

Mr. HAMLIN. While I have not so much faith in the force and effect of the provisions contained in the second section of this bill as the Senator from Ohio has, yet I can see in it that it has a look in the right direction. Having a look in the right direction, I can give to it my support, and I can vote with all cheerfulness against striking out that section precisely as it stands. But on conferring with various Senators and hearing the opinions of various Senators expressed, and listening to the words which fell from the Senator from Ohio himself, that he did not regard the time, 1876, as very material as some fixed time, I have risen for the purpose of moving to perfect this section by striking out "six" and inserting "seven" in the second line. I should not have made the motion if the suggestion had not fallen from the Senator himself. I shall not press it, I shall not ask even a vote of the Senate upon it, unless it shall meet the assent of the chairman of the committee, because I do not wish to interfere with the provisions of the bill. It is better that we have 1877 fixed than no time. I do not apprehend that the time now named in the bill is objectionable; but there are others who think that a longer period of time is more desirable. It is for that reason that I make the motion. I make it, however, upon the ground that it will not be opposed by the committee; if it shall be I shall withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves to amend the second section.

Mr. SHERMAN. All I can say is that the time was fixed very carefully by the Committee on Finance, and I am not therefore at liberty to consent to this amendment; but I am willing to take the vote of the Senate upon it. I do not want to debate it; it is a mere question of time. I ask for the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. SCHURZ. It is not necessary to have the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; let us take a vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

RAILING IN THE REAR OF SENATORS' DESKS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Senator from Delaware proceeds, the Chair asks the attention of the Senate. Senators have complained of the existence of the rail around the Senate Chamber and have requested the Chair to order it to be removed. As it was put there by the direction of the Vice-President, the Chair does not like to make that order unless it meets with the view of the Senate. If the Senate desire it removed, it can be done to-morrow; and if not, of course the Chair does not wish to order it to be done.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope it will be ordered. It was put here without any order of the Senate, and I hope the Senate will order it to be taken away. If there were no other reason, its unsightly character, in violation of everything like what is artistic, ought to compel it to be taken away. But that is not the least part of it. It makes the seats along where I am almost unendurable. We have a crowd leaning on this railing, sometimes twenty, who converse all the time and make it impossible for us to pay any attention to the business of the Senate, or to hear what is said.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator where they would go if the railing were removed?

Mr. THURMAN. They would sit back as they used to do, and they would not crowd on us. Let us take away this resting-place which they now have. I do not blame them for doing it. I would do the same thing if I were in their position. If the Senate puts a roost here for people to roost upon, if I were one of the people, I would roost too. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no objection is made, the Chair will order the rail to be removed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say one word. Some two months since I offered a resolution on this subject which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and I suppose it is still in their hands. I certainly am in favor of the removal of this railing. In conversation with the chairman of the committee, he said they were awaiting the return of the Vice-President and they would then determine the question. I have no objection to the Senate determining it now, except that I wished to mention that fact that the resolution was before the committee.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have sat on it two months, certainly the probability is that they will not decide it for two months longer; and we who are afflicted in this business I hope may have a vote of the Senate whether this thing shall remain or not.

Mr. CONKLING. As I have not the honor of occupying a seat on the back row, I do not feel at liberty to make any suggestion about this matter. Seeing that it is so objectionable, I venture, however, to warn the Senator from Ohio that the democratic portion of this crowd which he says leans on that rail, I am afraid, when it is taken away, will largely lean on him. [Laughter.] But that is a question for him.

Mr. THURMAN. I have been accustomed to bear a pressure all my life, and I have grown stout under it, increasing in weight every year. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and he will order the rail to be removed to-morrow.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection; but I certainly hope the order will include the restoration of the seats to their former position.

Mr. SARGENT. I was about to make that suggestion. The most inconvenient part of the whole thing is this huddling up of the desks, and the passages which now traverse the Chamber at intervals.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the change can all be made to-morrow, if the Senate desire it.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the change of seats?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To put them as they were, abolishing the aisles which now exist.

Mr. CONKLING. My impression is that they were moved together on account of the increased number of Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; to make the aisles. If there is no objection the Chair will order the rail to be removed and the desks to be restored to their former places.

Mr. DAVIS. As far as the rails are concerned, that is all right; but as to the seats, some of us prefer them as they are.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is very nice for my honorable friend, who has got in a broad way, while some of the rest of us are hedged in.

Mr. CAMERON. I rise to object to any change of the aisles. They are very pleasant and comfortable now. Any alteration would be for the worse. I am in favor of accommodating my honorable friend from Ohio by removing that bar behind him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take the sense of the Senate on the subject. Understanding that there is no objection to the removal of the rail, the Chair will order it to be removed. Now shall the seats be placed back so as to abolish the aisles? Senators in favor of that will say "ay;" those opposed will say "no." [Putting the question.] The ayes have it. The Sergeant-at-Arms will see that the arrangement is carried out to-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 2193) to ratify an agreement with certain Ute Indians in Colorado, and to make an appropriation for carrying out the same; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S.

No. 334) to remove the political disabilities of William L. Cabell, of Texas.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1762) concerning the practice in territorial courts and appeals therefrom.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 485) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the schooner Carrie, of Eastport, Maine;

A bill (H. R. No. 1954) granting a pension to Henry B. Ryder; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2651) reappropriating certain unexpended balances of appropriations for removal of Indians.

CURRENCY AND BANKING.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 617) to provide for the redemption and reissue of United States notes and for free banking.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] to the second section.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I rise to a point of order on that. I do it under the ruling of to-day and in order to preserve consistency.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is reminded that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] was awarded the floor and was requested to suspend for the purpose of submitting the question in regard to the removal of the railing.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask the Senator from Delaware to give way until I make a motion to go into executive session.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I yield.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator to withdraw that motion for a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania withdraw his motion?

Mr. CAMERON. For a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Senator from Delaware is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator from Delaware yield to me?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate resolved to adjourn over until Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is not in order at present.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall only occupy the attention of the Senate for two or three moments in reference to this amendment, and as it is likely that we shall be here for some time, perhaps I had better go on now.

Mr. President, if I could have any assurance that the second section of this bill would bring about specie payments, I should certainly vote for it; but I cannot agree with the views expressed by the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Finance Committee, that it would have that result. While I think it would increase the interest-bearing portion of the public debt, I do not believe it would bring us any nearer to the day of the redemption of our currency.

There is one other clause in this section to which I wish to direct attention. It provides for paying to the holders of greenbacks who may bring them to the Treasury in sums of $1,000, or any multiple of that sum, "an equal amount of the gold coin of the United States." The greenbacks to-day are not worth exceeding eighty-eight cents on the dollar, and if I have $1,000 in greenbacks, under the provisions of this bill I can take them to the Secretary of the Treasury and demand, according to my interpretation of that language, $1,000 in gold.

Mr. SHERMAN. Or a bond.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then the provision is to give to the holder of $1,000 in greenbacks, which are worth not exceeding $888, $1,000 in coin.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is, on the 1st of January, 1876.

Mr. SAULSBURY. What assurance have we that they will be worth that sum on the 1st day of January, 1876? In my opinion your greenbacks to-day are worth as much as will be their average in the next ten years. We have embarked on the sea of inflation and where are we to stop? You may legislate all you please in reference to this subject, but while you continue to increase the volume of greenbacks their depreciation will be marked and will also increase.

I therefore am opposed to that provision of this bill. If a modification were made allowing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the holder of these greenbacks when he carried them to the Treasury their marketable value, it would take away that objection; but as it now stands, under the provisions of this bill, if $1,000 of greenbacks are not worth $700 in the markets of the country the holder of those greenbacks can take them to the Treasury and demand $1,000 in coin, if the Treasury is in receipt of coin, or he can demand it in interest-bearing bonds if the Secretary is not able to pay the coin. That, in my opinion, is an objection to the provisions of this section as it stands.

But now will it bring about specie payments provided there should be a modification of that language? The Senator from Ohio assures us that he believes it will, and other gentlemen have expressed the opinion that the period fixed as the time when we are to arrive at specie payments in this section, the 1st day of January, 1876, is too soon. I think they may dispel all their fears on that point. We shall not reach specie payments by that time by any legislation that may be had. There is not enough coin in the country relatively to the amount of currency in the country to make it possible—I use that language and emphasize it—to make it possible to reach specie payments on the 1st day of January, 1876.

I concur in the views of the Senator from Ohio that this Government is bound by every consideration that ought to bind any Government on earth to redeem its plighted pledge. It ought to have been redeemed long ago. But when we see the tendency of things, as we have seen it in the Senate yesterday and to-day, a disposition to increase the volume of the currency, when and where are we to arrive at specie payments?

I heard the language of one Senator, I believe the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] yesterday, that we were about to bid farewell to specie payments. Yes, sir; we shall bid a final farewell to specie payments so far as the present generation is concerned if we continue to increase the volume of irredeemable paper currency. The next generation may possibly arrive at specie payments, but so far as the present generation is concerned, I see no hope that we shall arrive at specie payments if this system of continual expansion is pursued.

But the Senator from Ohio supposes that the provision of this bill which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to use the greenbacks which come into the Treasury in the purchase of bonds is to bring about specie payments. Why, sir, that has been the policy pursued by the Secretary of the Treasury for the last four or five years. He has used the currency or the coin which has come into the Treasury in purchasing the bonds of the country. He has attempted to strengthen, and perhaps has strengthened, the credit of the country abroad; he has enhanced the value of the bonds in foreign markets; but he has not brought us one step nearer to the specie payment of the greenbacks. That will continue to be the effect of it. If the greenbacks were converted into bonds or paid out for the purchase of other bonds of the Government, it would have no effect whatever to bring about specie payments. It might have the effect to increase and continue the price of bonds in the foreign market and even in this country, but it would have no tendency whatever to bring about specie payments for our currency. For that reason I do not see that there is much objection to striking out that provision. At any rate I do not feel that I can vote for it, and I therefore wished before voting to make this explanation of the reasons which will induce me to vote against it.

Mr. ANTHONY. As the order which the Senate has passed I suppose will require the Sergeant-at-Arms and his assistants to work not only to-morrow but to do something to-night, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SARGENT. Let us have an executive session.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well.

Mr. MORTON. I believe there is a motion pending to reconsider the vote to adjourn over until Monday.
